SENATORS ABSENT.

The following Senators were absent:

Hon. JACOB M. HOWARD, of Michigan; Hon. WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON, of Illinois; and Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, of New Jersey.

PRAYER.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D.D., (Chaplain to the Senate during the Thirty-Seventh Congress,) offered the following prayer:

Glory be to Thee, O God, the Father of men and the Ruler of nations, that, though the storm drives on, the Republic still lives. Not yet has foundered our ship of State. Glory be to Thee, Thou great Pilot of our fearful voyage, that hast upheld him who holds the helm, and with him all that have watched with him through the long and dreary night of our country's disasters—the Cabinet, the Congress, the judges and counselors, the Army and Navy, and the great loyal people, all behind them. Glory be to Thee for this free city in which their representatives this day meet. Glory be to Thee for the flying folds of the starry banner which Thou didst give for an ensign to our fathers, still streaming above the Capitol and the conclave now here assembled; and we do beseech and pray Thee that the statue of Liberty that now crowns this temple of the nation, uplifted in the utmost majesty of human undertaking, as it shall greet all eyes, may betoken forever that grander and mightier spirit which shall walk in the air we breathe, and march upon the mountains and the plains, upon the streams and lakes of all the land, and dwell in all the households and hearts of the people—the spirit of a nobler justice and a freer franchise towards all the tribes of men. We beseech Thee, O Lord, to recover the President from his present illness again to health. Bless Thy servant presiding in this Hall. Prepare the Senators and Representatives for the great work which is before them. Be sword and shield to our men in battle; succor them that suffer in camp, or hospital, or prison, or that hide away from bitter persecution in the wilds and solitudes of nature; and solace all that weep and pray for them in their distance and separation; and be Thou still our Advocate and Defender before the kingdoms of the world, to redeem us from sin, to purify, exalt, and perpetuate us to the honor of Thy name in all the earth. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time specified in the Constitution for the assembling of Congress having arrived, the Senate will now please come to order.

CREDENTIALS OF NEW SENATORS.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to present the credentials of the Senators elect from the State of West Virginia, and to announce to the Chair that they are present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials of Hon. WILKINSON T. WILLEY and Hon. PETER G. VAN WINKLE, elected by the Legislature of West Virginia for such terms in the Senate as they may be respectively assigned to according to the Constitution.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to present the credentials of Hon. JOHN CONNESS, Senator elect from the State of California. I ask that they be read and placed on the files, and that the oath of office be administered to him.

The Secretary read the credentials of Mr. CONNESS, elected by the Legislature of the State of California for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1863.

Mr. FOOT. I offer the following resolution and order in respect to the classification of the Senators from West Virginia; it is in the usual form—

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senators are present whose credentials have been presented, they will please come forward and be qualified by taking the required oath of office.

Messrs. WILLEY, VAN WINKLE, and CONNESS advanced to the President's desk.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire what motion is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no motion before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire what proceeding the President of the Senate proposes now to take?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggested that the Senators whose credentials had been presented should come to the Chair and take the oath required to enable them to enter upon the discharge of their official duties; and they, as the Chair now understands, are present, and ready to take the oath.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in relation to the Senators from West Virginia I object to such a proceeding, and upon that I ask for a division of the Senate. I hold that there is, legally and constitutionally, no such State in existence as the State of "West Virginia," and consequently that no Senators from such a State—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kentucky suspend his remarks for a moment, and allow the Chair to administer the oath of office to the Senator from California, to whom his objection does not apply?

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that. I was going to propose that the proceedings should be separate.

The VICE PRESIDENT administered the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and also the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, to Mr. CONNESS, and he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. FOOT. Before proceeding to the consideration of the question raised by the Senator from Kentucky, I desire to present the credentials of Mr. HENDERSON, Senator elect from the State of Missouri; and I ask that they be read, and the oath administered to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read, the Senator from Kentucky waiving his right to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly

The Secretary read the credentials of Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, elected by the Legislature of Missouri a Senator from that State for the term of six years, from the 4th of March, 1863.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Missouri will come forward to the Chair, the proper oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. HENDERSON advanced to the desk, and the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose on making this objection to occupy any great portion of the time of the Senate. My object is simply to raise a question to be put upon the record, and to have my name as a Senator recorded against the recognition of West Virginia as a State of the United States. I have been taught to believe, and I am still of the opinion, that as yet there is but one State of Virginia, legally and constitutionally. I do not believe that the Old Dominion, like a polypus, can be separated into different segments, and each segment become a living, constitutional organism, in this mode. The question of erecting West Virginia into a separate State was mooted some twenty years ago in the other House of Congress, of which at that time it was my fortune to be a member. To that proposition I was always friendly, and I still believe that that portion of our common country ought to constitute a separate and independent State; but I believe that that State ought to be created in strict conformity to the Constitution, and that the present State of "West Virginia," as it has been organized, and as it is seeking representation on the floor of the Senate, is in flagrant violation of the Constitution. I therefore call for a division of the Senate, and ask for the yeas and nays upon the question of admitting the gentlemen who present themselves as Senators from the State of West Virginia, to take their seats as members of this body.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the impression of the Chair, there is no question before the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then let the gentlemen be sworn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The object of the Senator from Kentucky may be reached by a specific motion; but there is no motion before the Senate now. The ordinary course is to administer the oath to Senators elect whose credentials have been presented, and that is the duty of the Chair; but if a resolution prescribing a different course be interposed, it then becomes the duty of the Chair to present that resolution to the Senate. Nothing of the kind is before the Senate now; there is now no motion before the body.

Mr. DAVIS. I then move to refer the question—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of administering the oath?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; the matter of administering the oath to those gentlemen, I move to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That brings the question before the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the Chair state the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the subject of administering the oath of office to the Senators elect.

Mr. COLLAMER. We have no committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to inquire of the Chair if there is any such committee yet organized?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no such committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this is not a new question in the Senate. I do not pretend to remember all the cases; but my recollection is that whenever any credentials are presented it is usually the course to move that they be received and read, and that the oath of office be administered to the member. If I remember aright, that is the ordinary mode; and I think, without any other motion made, that raises the question of right. If my recollection is correct, there was a very contested question, somewhat similar to this, when General Shields presented himself as a Senator from the State of Illinois. The question was raised whether he was eligible, and I think it was raised on the motion to administer the oath and admit him to his seat. If that is a precedent, and I think it is, it seems to me that this is the most orderly way of raising the question. There is necessarily a motion that the credentials be received, read, put on file, and the oath administered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I would inquire whether two gentlemen professing to represent a State of the United States can offer themselves here to become members of this body, without a question, without a motion. It seems to me that a business so grave and so important as that cannot take place without a distinct motion; and I think the suggestion of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire is correct, that no man can present himself to this body, and ask to be qualified and received as a member of it, without a distinct motion to that effect. If the Chair should concur in opinion with the Senator from New Hampshire, I would propose to lay upon the table the motion to receive the credentials.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest that the motion to refer to a committee is allowable. I made such a motion myself in the case of the late Senator from Oregon, (Mr. Stark,) when his credentials were submitted to the Senate, and, if I recollect aright, that course was taken. The credentials were sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was some time before the oath was administered, and not until a final decision by the Senate upon the question. This, therefore, is not a new course; and it strikes me, without prejudging this case, that there ought to be some mode in which a question of this kind might be reached, or a question of any kind affecting the right of a Senator to take his seat; otherwise we should be merely at the mercy of a custom. I objected then—and I have certainly no disposition to withdraw now what I then said—to the idea that the mere presentation of credentials should entitle any man to take the oath and his seat on this floor and act with us, if the Senate chose to investigate the subject. Now, the Senator from Kentucky raises a question. I suppose, if there is no Committee on the Judiciary, a motion to refer to a select committee of the Senate may answer, or a motion to postpone the consideration of the matter until the Committee on the Judiciary shall have been raised. Certainly there are divers modes in which the question may be reached. All that I rose for was simply to say that I agree entirely with what seems to be the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that there should be some mode in which the question can be presented; and that the mere presentation of credentials does not entitle any gentleman to take his seat on the floor.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, the usual and ordinary course was taken in presenting the credentials of these gentlemen. I have never known any question put to the body as to whether a man should be sworn in agreeably to his credentials; and therefore the mere presentation of the credentials raises no question. When men are presented to be sworn in according to their credentials, that raises no question before the body. I do not mean to suggest by this that a question may not be made. There may be one made by a proper motion; and I inquired of the Chair what was the question about it; and I again desire to inquire how the Chair understands the question now. What is the question before the body?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the body, in the impression of the Chair, is now on referring this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary. There is no such committee, it is suggested; but the effect of the passage of such an order at this time, in the impression of the Chair, would be that the question would necessarily go to that committee when it shall have been organized.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then the question is about referring these credentials.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the permission of the Senate, the Chair will state that its ruling it believes is in accordance with the practice of the Senate. The usual course, when credentials have been presented, has been for the gentleman presenting them to announce that the Senator elect is now ready to take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution. Evidently there should be a period of time when the question of right can be presented to the Senate. It is equally evident to the Chair that the question can be as well presented when the person so claiming to have the oath of office administered to him presents himself, by moving to postpone the whole subject for a day, or, as in this case, to refer it to a select committee or to a standing committee. The question may be just as well raised by a specific motion of that kind, as by assuming that there is a necessary motion in the preliminary stage. The Chair has thus ruled because this course is in accordance with the practice of the Senate; not that it does not give an opportunity of raising the question equally as well as if you presume that a question should be originally put, which I think the Senator from Vermont is right in saying has never been put to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that there is a very easy way of obviating any difficulty here. I apprehend there can be no necessity for a reference of this question. I do not presume that the Senator from Kentucky desires that, or anything more than an expression of the Senate upon a matter which has already been discussed and determined really in the Senate at a former session. When credentials are presented and it is asked that the Senators elect be sworn, the ordinary practice is, without putting any motion, to swear the Senators; but here an objection is interposed. It seems to me that raises a question whether the oath of office shall be administered to the Senators elect; and on that we may vote and dispose of the question at once, unless some Senator should desire an investigation and to have it go to a committee. It is analogous to the course pursued when a petition or other paper is presented and objected to. A paper is presented to the Senate. Some Senator thinks there is something in the character of the paper which should forbid its reception. He raises the question; objects to its being received. The question is put to the Senate, "Shall the paper be received?" Questions have been raised in that way in this body. Although I am quite willing that this question should be raised—it is the right of any Senator to raise it—I do not think it involves, in the shape in which it is now presented here, the point about which we have had great controversy in the Senate; and that was, whether a person presenting a prima facie case should first be sworn in, and his right to a seat subsequently investigated, and the Senator turned out if the Senate should be of opinion that he was not entitled to occupy a seat here. This is a question of administering the oath, not because there is anything beyond which should turn the Senators out after the oath is administered, but because, in the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky, these parties could not under any circumstances be Senators, because there is no such State as that which they profess to represent. It seems to me the question may be put to the Senate in that simple form, Shall the oath be administered? and I hope the Senate will acquiesce in that suggestion, and we can dispose of it at once.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky having made the question he desires, that is all he cares for, unless to have a vote. The sending a matter to a committee is for the purpose of obtaining and laying before that committee, and having that committee report to the body, some facts not already known and understood. You want the intervention of a committee for that purpose. Certainly, then, in this case, when no such purpose exists, when no occasion of that kind is before us, the sending to a committee must be entirely a mere matter of form. The Senator from Kentucky does not propose to go to that committee and show any new matter of objection to these gentlemen personally, or to their election, or to the form and manner of its certification; but his objection is that the State itself which they come here purporting to represent in this body has not been constitutionally created. The Judiciary Committee know no more about that question than the whole body knows already.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be a singular idea that we can raise a question in relation to the constitutionality of a State organization after it has been organized by a law adopted by this body and by the House of Representatives, and approved by the President. It being matter of law, for us to entertain a question as to the constitutionality of that law, and to decide it in one body here, without our action going to either of the others, is a manner of undertaking to judge of the qualifications of our own members which I think inconsistent with the Constitution itself. It seems to me that it is a settled question. If the gentleman wishes to raise it again in this form, I think we may as well take the vote now, as a test question, whether we will refer this matter for the purpose which the gentleman has in view. He states his object and his purpose. Now, the question is, will we entertain a motion of that kind, to send this matter to a committee for such a purpose? If not, vote it down, and let the Senators elect be sworn in. I take it that is all the gentleman desires, to have a vote.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, all I desired was, at the threshold that the Senate should divide upon the question of receiving the two gentlemen who have been named as Senators to this body from the new State of West Virginia. Notwithstanding my respect for the ability of my learned friend from Vermont, who disputes the power of the Senate, at this time, to raise this question, I do not entertain a doubt upon that point. Although this State has been organized by a pro forma act of Congress, and that act has been passed according to all the forms required by the Constitution, still, if the Senate believe that that act is a nullity, that it is in direct contravention to the Constitution, and therefore void and inoperative in creating a new State, it is perfectly competent and regular that every Senator entertaining that opinion should vote in accordance with it.

The honorable Senator from Vermont is right in relation to the object which I have in view. I had no design or purpose that the attention of the Senate should be occupied thus long in relation to this matter. All I desired was a division of the Senate upon some material question that would test the principle whether it recognized the new State of West Virginia as one of the United States, or not. With a view to reach that object as speedily as possible, I move that the oath which the Constitution prescribes shall be administered to Senators, be not administered to the two gentlemen who present themselves as Senators from the new State of Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That, then, (the Senator so modifying his motion,) is the question before the Senate: Shall the oath of office be administered to the persons claiming to be Senators elect from the State of West Virginia? Is the Senate ready for that question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to make a motion that the oath be not administered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then those who are in favor of administering the oath will vote in the negative on this motion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. That would be the impression of the Chair.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I wish to understand the question.

MR. WADE. If the Senator from Kentucky will withdraw his motion, I will put it in the affirmative shape, that they be admitted to their seats and have the oath administered to them. That would put the question in a better shape. It would be the same question.

MR. DAVIS. I think so, and I accept the suggestion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio, then, submits, affirmatively, a motion that the oath of office be administered to the Senators elect from the State of West Virginia.

MR. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bowden, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson of Massachusetts—36.

NAYS.—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, McDougal, and Powell—5.

MR. HALE. Before the result is announced, I wish to inquire if the name of Mr. Wilson, of Missouri, was called. I think I heard it called. I do not know of any such member.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri was called. He was appointed to this body, and holds his seat here until a successor appears and qualifies.

MR. WILSON, of Massachusetts. It is a Governor's appointment.

MR. HALE. That is not the law.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. A successor has been elected, but has not appeared.

MR. FOOT. Another question intervenes. In the case of a former colleague of mine, Judge Phelps, the Chair will well recollect, it was decided that after the Legislature of the State had convened and failed to elect, as in that case, the appointee under the Executive of the State no longer held under that appointment.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recollects that very well.

MR. FOOT. The Legislature of Missouri, as I understand, have been together and have elected a successor. Even if no successor had been elected, under the decision in the case of Judge Phelps, and confirmed subsequently in the case of a member, Mr. Williams, from New Hampshire, after the rising of that Legislature the executive appointment falls, terminates.

MR. GRIMES. I suspect, Mr. President, that the Legislature of Missouri has not yet adjourned. If it has not, I take it that Mr. Wilson holds, under the Constitution and laws, until the adjournment of the General Assembly of that State, or until a successor shall appear and present his credentials.

MR. COLLAMER. I take it, Mr. President, he does not hold the seat if the Legislature have elected a man to his place.

MR. GRIMES. But we do not know that the Legislature has done any such thing, and we shall not know it until the credentials of that man shall be presented, or the Legislature adjourns. I think the Legislature has not adjourned.

MR. HENDERSON. The General Assembly of my State, elected in November, 1862, met in December, 1862, and adjourned in March, 1863, to a future day, the second Tuesday in November, 1863. The General Assembly, before the adjournment in March, 1863, called a joint session for the purpose of electing Senators, which joint session was to meet on the Thursday succeeding the second Tuesday in November of 1863. On the 13th day of November last the General Assembly elected Mr. Brown in the place of my colleague. I am not familiar with the cases referred to by the Senator from Vermont. I do not know whether in the cases referred to the Legislature adjourned sine die, or whether they adjourned to a day fixed.

MR. GRIMES. Is the Legislature of Missouri still in session?

MR. HENDERSON. The Legislature is still in session in my State.

MR. TRUMBULL. The Legislature adjourned in March last, after the executive appointments were made by the Governor of Missouri. The Legislature of the State of Missouri having convened, and having at that session failed to elect members to the Senate, nothing can be clearer to me than that the executive appointments fell with the adjournment of that Legislature. The Constitution does not mean that the Legislature may adjourn from year to year, and that the Executive appointee can hold. The language of the Constitution is, that in case of vacancy the executive may make an appointment to continue until the—

MR. JOHNSON. End of the next session.

MR. TRUMBULL. Not until the end of the Legislature.

MR. CLARK. "Until the next meeting."

MR. TRUMBULL. Until the next meeting of the Legislature. Has the Senator from New Hampshire the clause before him?

MR. CLARK. Yes, sir. These are the words of the Constitution:

"If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

MR. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, "until the next meeting of the Legislature." The Legislature had its meeting and adjourned without electing any Senators at all—adjourned for six months. That certainly is to my mind conclusive that the appointees of the Governor could not hold their offices after that time, whether the Legislature at its present session had elected Senators or not.

MR. HALE. I think that the view presented by the Senator from Illinois is entirely correct. That word "meeting" has been construed over and over again, and the most liberal construction that has ever been claimed for it is that it extends to the adjournment of the first meeting of the Legislature. The attempt has been made to hold over in this way, as the Senator from Vermont has expressed it, in the case of one gentleman from Vermont, and also in a case from my own State, where Mr. Williams insisted upon having his seat here after the Legislature had met and adjourned; but I believe he was finally ejected by the Sergeant-at-Arms from a secret session of the Senate.

But, sir, there is a case stronger than that, which occurred here in the history of the Senate. I refer to the case of Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Boston, who held an appointment under the Executive of the State of Massachusetts for the same term for which these appointments are always conferred. While he was here in the Senate he received news through the newspapers that Mr. Robert Rantoul had been elected by the Massachusetts Legislature in his place, and he suggested to the Senate the propriety of his acting any longer. I do not remember that any action was had upon it; but I think that the advice of several of the older members of the Senate was taken, Judge Butler, who was then at the head of the Judiciary Committee, among others, who suggested that there was a manifest impropriety in the Senator holding over, and Mr. Winthrop, I think, packed up his books in his seat, and left the Hall immediately. That was a case where the Legislature was in session and had never had an adjournment; but here I understand there was a meeting and an adjournment, and if the Constitution has any meaning at all, it applies to this case.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will excuse the Chair for calling attention to the fact that the Senator whose name is referred to has not voted on this call of the roll, and therefore his name being there does not affect this question. That being the case, and as the Senators elect from the State of West Virginia are waiting to take the oath of office, the Chair suggests that they be allowed to do so, and this question can be settled afterwards. Is there any objection to announcing the vote?

MR. HALE. I think the fact that the Senate sit by and recognize his being called by the Secretary without objection would be a tacit admission of his right to sit. I think the name should be taken out, but I have no particular desire to press the question now.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. On the question of administering the oath of office to the Senators elect from West Virginia the yeas are 36, and the nays 5. The Senators from West Virginia will now present themselves and take the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution.

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, were administered to Messrs. WILLEY and VAN WINKLE, and they took their seats in the Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution was submitted by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foot,] which will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of West Virginia shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th of May, 1860, and as the Constitution requires.

Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot-box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered one, and the other shall be a blank. Each of the Senators of the State of West Virginia shall draw out one paper, and the Senator who shall draw the paper numbered one shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1869. That the Secretary then put into the ballot-box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered two, and the other shall be numbered three. The other Senator shall draw out one paper. If the paper drawn be numbered two, the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1865; and if the paper drawn be numbered three, the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1867.

MR. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I desire to say, by way of memorandum simply, that I hold this all to be exceedingly wrong, for I believe you cannot make a State of Western Virginia.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senators from West Virginia will now advance to the Secretary's desk for the purpose of drawing terms, in accordance with the resolution just adopted.

Two papers, one a blank and the other numbered one, being put by the Secretary into the ballot-box, Hon. W. T. WILLEY drew the blank, and Hon. P. G. VAN WINKLE the paper numbered one; and the latter gentleman is accordingly in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1869. Two other papers, numbered two and three, being then put into the ballot-box by the Secretary, Hon. W. T. WILLEY drew the paper numbered two, and is accordingly in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1865.

HOOR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock, meridian, until otherwise ordered.

SEAT OF HON. ROBERT WILSON.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether Hon. Robert Wilson is still a Senator from the State of Missouri.

Mr. FOOT. It lies on the table.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members, be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to appoint the committee; and he appointed Messrs. FOOT, TRUMBULL, and NESMITH.

MR. HALE. Is it not usual to notify the House of Representatives that the Senate are in session?

MR. FOOT. This is a permanent body, and the custom is, and the courtesy is, to wait until we are notified that there is a House of Representatives.

MR. HALE. Very well.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

MR. LANE, of Indiana. I wish to give notice that I shall ask leave to-morrow, or upon some subsequent day, to introduce the following bills: A bill to repeal the $300 exemption clause in the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," passed at the last session of Congress;

A bill to increase the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates in the Army of the United States fifty per cent.; and also

A bill to provide for the safe and speedy allotment and transfer of officers' and soldiers' pay in the Army to their families or to other persons.

Mr. POWELL, (after a pause.) There seems to be nothing before the body, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 7, 1863.

This being the day set apart by the Constitution for the meeting of Congress, the members of the House of Representatives assembled in their Hall; and at twelve o'clock, m., were called to order by Hon. EMERSON ETHERIDGE, of Tennessee, Clerk of the last House.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

The CLERK said: This being the hour fixed by law for the first meeting of the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, the Clerk of the last House of Representatives will now, if it be the pleasure of the members present, proceed to call the roll of the members elect thereto, calling the names of such persons, and such persons only, whose credentials show that they have been regularly elected in accordance with the laws of the States respectively, and with the laws of the United States. The Clerk will first call the members elect from the State of Maine, and those who may be present are requested to respond to their names when they are called.

The following members answered to their names:

Mr. STEVENS. If the Clerk has concluded the reading of the list which he proposes to read, I ask that, for the information of the House, he will now read the names which he has omitted to call.

The CLERK. The Clerk asks first to be indulged in reading the names of the Delegates from the Territories.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

The CLERK then called the following Delegates, who responded to their names:

DELEGATE FROM NEW MEXICO.

Francisco Perea.

DELEGATE FROM UTAH.

John F. Kenney.

DELEGATE FROM WASHINGTON.

George E. Cole.

DELEGATE FROM NEBRASKA.

Samuel G. Daily.

DELEGATE FROM COLORADO.

Hiram P. Bennett.

DELEGATE FROM DAKOTA.

J. B. S. Todd.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Did Mr. Todd file his credentials?

The CLERK. He did.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to give notice that at the proper time I will move an amendment.

The CLERK. There were two credentials filed, and on the internal evidence the Clerk decided to call the name of Mr. Todd on the roll of Delegates. Both papers are upon file for any future action of the House.

The Clerk will now state that other gentlemen from different States have filed credentials, and that he has not placed their names upon the roll for the reason that those credentials did not show, or rather in his opinion did not show, what they ought to have shown, according to the act of the 3d of March, 1863. The Clerk will now submit these credentials to the House, with the names of the members referred to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask a question.

The CLERK. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. LOVEJOY] has the floor.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I understand that what I propose in reference to the Delegate from Dakota Territory can be as well done when members and Delegates are sworn in, and I therefore withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me ask the Clerk whether, so far as is known, there are any contestants for the seats of the members whose names he has omitted to call with the other members of the House?

The CLERK. Some are contested, others are not contested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the Clerk, for the information of the House, state the names of the members whose seats are contested?

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. I desire to present my credentials to a seat upon this floor from the second congressional district of the State of West Virginia.

The CLERK. From proof on file in the office of the Clerk, if it be proper to state it, three or four of the Missouri members have contestants for their seats upon this floor. Who they are the Clerk does not now recollect. There are so many seats contested from that State that the Clerk would probably make a mistake if he undertook to specify them. They are the only contested seats, with the exception of one from West Virginia.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the Clerk to read the credentials of the members whose names have not been called.

The CLERK. The Clerk intends to do that in submitting the matter to the consideration of the House.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Clerk, is there any law which requires contestants to submit notice of contest to be put upon file in the Clerk's office of the House of Representatives?

Mr. STILES. I ask for the reading of the law of the 3d of March, 1863, which has been indicated by the Clerk.

The CLERK. What the Clerk has said about contested seats he has drawn from papers on file in his office. There has been no notice of contest filed there. The Clerk will read the law of the 3d of March, 1863. It is as follows:

An Act to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives elect, and place thereon the names of all persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.

Mr. NOBLE. I do not know that it is necessary to now give notice who are contestants, but I will say that the seat of Mr. Grinnell, from Iowa, is contested by Mr. Hugh M. Martin. I do not understand what the object of the Clerk is in stating what seats are contested. Mr. Martin's papers, I believe, are upon file in the Clerk's office. If they are not, they ought to be.

The CLERK. The Clerk will state that he has taken no notice of contest in making out the roll of members, but that he has been governed entirely by the papers before the House. He has not felt himself authorized to take notice of contested seats. The Clerk will read the credentials on file from the State of Missouri.

Mr. DAWES. Read those from the State of Maryland; they seem to be the first upon the list.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF MARYLAND, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT:

Whereas an election was held in this State on the 4th of November, 1863, for five members in the Congress of the United States, and the constitution and laws of the State make it the duty of the Governor in case of such elections to ascertain the number of votes given for each person voted for from the returns of the judges of election, certified to him for that purpose, and also provide that in all elections the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared elected; and whereas, by the returns of said judges, certified as required, and an enumeration made therefrom of the votes given for the several candidates for said office, it appears that, in the first congressional district, JOHN A. J. CRESWELL had the greatest number of votes; in the second congressional district, EDWIN H. WEBSTER had the greatest number of votes; in the third congressional district, HENRY WINTER DAVIS had the greatest number of votes; in the fourth congressional district, FRANCIS THOMAS had the greatest number of votes; and in the fifth congressional district, BENJAMIN G. HARRIS had the greatest number of votes:

Now, therefore, I, AUGUSTUS W. BRADFORD, Governor of the State of Maryland, do certify and declare that the said JOHN A. J. CRESWELL, EDWIN H. WEBSTER, HENRY WINTER DAVIS, FRANCIS THOMAS, and BENJAMIN G. HARRIS are duly elected members of the House of Representatives to represent this State in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the great seal of the State to be hereto affixed, at the city of Annapolis, this 4th day of December, 1863.

A. W. BRADFORD.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Clerk, I offer the following resolution; and upon it I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the names of JOHN A. J. CRESWELL, EDWIN H. WEBSTER, HENRY WINTER DAVIS, FRANCIS THOMAS, and BENJAMIN G. HARRIS be placed on the roll of this House as Representatives from Maryland.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to lay the resolution upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STILES. I rise to a point of order. I would inquire if that resolution is in order?

The CLERK. The Clerk is of opinion that it is in order, as being pertinent to the organization of the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Before the roll is called I desire to ask a question of the Clerk. I hope it may please the Clerk to state the reasons why he has not placed the names of the Maryland members on the roll.

Mr. ASHLEY. I object to that, if it is not in order.

The CLERK. It is not in order if objection be made.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Cottman, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herlick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kathfisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazenar, Le Bond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Colfax, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Field, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hutchins, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—94.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The announcement of the result of the vote was received with loud applause from the galleries.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the rules will be enforced. I understand that the rules of the last House are the rules of this, and that they give the Clerk special power to enforce order.

The CLERK. The demonstration is made by those who know the rules, and know that the Clerk has no power to enforce them. If he had the power he would do so.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution was adopted, amid renewed applause from the galleries.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I now ask for the reading of the credentials of the Missouri members whose names are not included on the roll.

The CLERK. The Clerk was just about to report them to the House. The Clerk would state that, as the credentials are all in the same form, he presumes the reading of one of them will be satisfactory.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly.

The CLERK. The Clerk will read the credentials of HENRY T. BLOW, from the second congressional district of Missouri, which is substantially if not precisely the same as the others. It is as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF MISSOURI,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
CITY OF JEFFERSON, MISSOURI:

I, Mordecai Oliver, secretary of state of the State of Missouri, do hereby certify that, at an election held in pursuance of law in the several counties comprising the second congressional district in the State of Missouri, on the 4th day of November, 1862, Hon. HENRY T. BLOW, having received the highest number of votes cast at said election as a candidate for Congress, was duly elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States of America from the said second congressional district.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Missouri.
[L. s.] Done at the city of Jefferson, on the 10th day of November, 1862.

M. OLIVER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I offer the following resolution; and upon it I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the names of FRANCIS P. BLAIR, JR., HENRY T. BLOW, JOHN W. MCCLURG, S. H. BOYD, BENJAMIN LOAN, and WILLIAM A. HALL be placed on the roll as Representatives from the State of Missouri.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise a question of order on that resolution. It is, that by a resolution of the House it is proposed to instruct the Clerk to do an act which he is expressly prohibited from doing by an act of Congress, the Clerk being the exclusive judge as to the sufficiency of the certificates under that act.

The CLERK. The Clerk would state that the effect of this resolution would be simply to place these gentlemen in the same position as others. While the Clerk would have no power to amend the roll, the effect of this resolution would be that the names of these gentlemen would be called in the organization of the House, and the Clerk thinks the resolution is in order.

Mr. YEAMAN. I rise to a question of privilege. It is this: I have a very distinct opinion as to the legal effect of these certificates, and also in reference to those from the State of Maryland. I remained silent, however, in the case of the Maryland members, from a sense of delicacy and propriety, because my own seat is contested. I ask now to be excused from voting on this resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution offered by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask for the reading of the credentials of the member from Oregon.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF OREGON, to wit:
This certifies that at an election held within and for the State aforesaid, on the 2d day of June, A. D. 1862, John H. McBride received 6,509 votes, and R. E. Waitt received 3,632 votes, for member of Congress. Therefore the said John H. McBride, having received a majority of all the votes cast at the said election, is hereby declared duly elected to represent the State of Oregon in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name, and affixed the seal of said State, at Salem, this 30th day of June, 1862.

JOHN WHITEAKER.

By the Governor:

LUCIEN HEATH, Secretary of State.

By Chester N. Terry, Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question upon it:

Resolved, That the name of JOHN R. MCBRIDE be placed on the roll as Representative from the State of Oregon.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I now call for the reading of the credentials of the Representative from Kansas.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF KANSAS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE,
TOPEKA, December 25, 1862.

This is to certify that the board of State canvassers, assembled at the city of Topeka on Monday, December 15, A. D. 1862, under authority given by law, did declare and determine that A. C. WILDER was duly elected, on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1862, to the office of Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States for the State of Kansas.

[L. s.] In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 25th day of December, 1862.

S. E. SHEPHERD, Secretary of State.

Mr. PIKE. I submit the following resolution; and upon it I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the name of A. CARTER WILDER be placed on the roll as member of the House of Representatives from the State of Kansas.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask for the reading of the credentials of the members from West Virginia.

The CLERK. The credentials of the members from West Virginia are all in the same form; and unless the reading of all of them be called for, the Clerk will simply read the credentials of Mr. KELLIAN V. WHALEY.

The credentials of Mr. WHALEY were read, as follows:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, to wit:

I, Arthur J. Boreman, Governor of said State, pursuant to the act of the Legislature thereof in such case made and provided, do hereby certify that KELLIAN V. WHALEY, Esq., of the county of Mason, was duly chosen on the 22d day of October, in the year 1863, a Representative in the Congress of the United States for the third congressional district of this State, composed of the counties of Kanawha, Jackson, Mason, Putnam, Cabell, Clay, Wayne, Logan, Boone, Braxton, Nicholas, Boone, McDowell, Wyoming, Raleigh, Fayette, Mercer, Monroe, and Greenbrier, for the term ending on the 3d day of March, in the year 1865.

Given under my hand, and the great seal of the said State of West Virginia, this 23d day of November, in the [L. s.] year of our Lord 1863, and of the State the first.

A. J. BOREMAN.

By the Governor:

J. EDGAR BAYERS, Secretary of State.

Mr. STEVENS. I submit the following resolution; and on its adoption I call the previous question:

Resolved, That the names of JACOB B. BLAIR, WILLIAM G. BROWN, and KELLIAN V. WHALEY be placed upon the roll as the Representatives from West Virginia.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask to have the credentials of the persons claiming to be Representatives from the so-called State of Louisiana read.

The CLERK. The Clerk will gratify the curiosity of the gentleman. [Laughter.]

The credentials were read, as follows:

I, John Leonard Riddell, Governor of the State of Louisiana, duly and legally elected by the voters of said State, in pursuance of the constitution and laws of said State, do hereby certify that at an election begun and held in said State on the 2d day of November, 1863, in accordance with the laws of said State, for the purpose of electing five Representatives from said State to the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, the following named persons were regularly elected to represent said State in said Congress for the term of two years from the 4th of March, 1863; namely:

From the first congressional district, A. P. FIELD.

From the second congressional district, THOMAS COTTMAN.

From the fifth congressional district, composed of the whole State of Louisiana, JOSHUA BAKER.

All of whom were regularly elected in accordance with the constitution and laws of said State of Louisiana.

In testimony whereof, I, John Leonard Riddell, Governor, elected as aforesaid, and duly sworn, do hereby commission said persons, so elected as aforesaid, to represent said State in the said Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, and do hereby give these credentials in evidence of their legal and regular election as aforesaid; and I do hereby affix my name and private seal of office (the public seal thereof being forcibly kept in the possession of the public enemies of the State) on this 20th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1863, and the eighty-eighth year of the independence of the United States of America.

[L. S.] J. L. RIDDELL,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following resolution; and on it I call the previous question:

Resolved, That the names of A. P. FIELD, THOMAS COTTMAN, and JOSHUA BAKER be stricken from the roll of the members of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order on that resolution. I submit that before the organization of the House the law of Congress expressly defines what shall be the duties of the Clerk in respect to the members whose names shall be placed on the rolls of the House; that this resolution is in conflict with that enactment, and cannot, therefore, be entertained by the Clerk, inasmuch as it directs an act to be done in violation of an act of Congress.

The CLERK. The Clerk will sustain the point of order, but upon another ground. The resolution virtually directs the expulsion of members, which the Clerk decides cannot be done before the organization of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I appeal from the decision of the Clerk.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. DAWES. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. BROOKS. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is all a waste of time. You can elect your Speaker without it.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, having placed on record my protest against the appearance of the names of these gentlemen on the rolls of the House, I am willing to withdraw my resolution until the members have been sworn in.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask that the credentials of the members from the State of Virginia may be read.

The CLERK. The credentials of Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. SEGAR will be read. Those of Mr. KITCHEN are similar in form.

The credentials were read, as follows:

STATE OF VIRGINIA:

I, John B. Allworth, clerk of the county court of Accomac county, do certify that on the thirtieth day from the commencement of the election for a member of Congress for the first congressional district of Virginia, held on the 28th day of May last, I, in the presence of two freeholders, opened and examined the certified copy, by the clerk of the county court of Northampton county, of the result of said election in said county of Northampton, and have compared the returns from the respective counties comprising said district; and it is hereby certified that at an election held on the 28th day of May, in the year 1863, in the counties comprising the first congressional district of Virginia, JOSEPH SEGAR was duly elected to represent the same in the Congress of the United States.

Given under my hand this 27th day of June, A. D. 1863.

Attest: J. B. ALLWORTH,
Clerk Accomac Court.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the names of LUCIUS H. CHANDLER, JOSEPH SEGAR, and BETHUEL M. KITCHEN be placed on the roll as Representatives from the State of Virginia.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to lay that resolution on the table; and on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If there is going to be a contest about it, I will withdraw the resolution.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I renew the resolution.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I renew the motion to lay the resolution on the table, for the reason that these men are certified to only by some county clerk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the permission of my colleague, I desire to ask whether these gentlemen are not certified to in the manner and form required by the laws of Virginia?

The CLERK. In response to the gentleman from Illinois, the Clerk will, if permitted, say that his attention is called to a law passed by the Legislature of Virginia, sitting at Wheeling, requiring that the election of members of Congress from that State shall be certified to by the clerk of the county first named in the law describing the congressional district, and that these credentials are perhaps in conformity to that law.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is there an official seal?

The CLERK. There is not.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If the credentials are in accordance with law, I do not withdraw my resolution.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. They are strictly in accordance with law.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I do not yield further. I understand these gentlemen purport to come from the State of Virginia, not from the State of Kanawha, or West Virginia, as it is called. I ask for the vote on my motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask that the law of Virginia under which these credentials come may be read.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Is that a law of Virginia, or of West Virginia?

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. For the information of the gentleman I will say to him that it is not a law of West Virginia, but of the State of Virginia previous to the formation of West Virginia. It was passed by a Legislature the validity of which was fully recognized by the last Congress.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Then it was by the Legislature of that State before its division, and therefore of another State.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. No, by the State of Virginia.

The law was read, as follows:

"1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That in all cases of elections for election districts, or senatorial or congressional districts, the commissioners superintending the elections at the court-houses of the several counties or corporations forming such districts shall, within three days after such election is concluded, deliver a certified statement of the result of the election in said county (to be ascertained in the manner now prescribed by law) to the clerk of the county court of such county, whose duty it shall be, as soon as he may be able, to record such result in a book for that purpose to be kept in his office, and transmit a certified copy of such result (which shall be written in words and not in figures) to the clerk of the county court of the county first named in the law describing such district, whose duty it shall be, on a certain day, appointed by law, from the commencement of such election—which certain day, if an election from a district of a Delegate, shall be the fifteenth of a Senator, the twentieth; of a Representative in Congress, shall be the thirtieth after such commencement—in the presence of two freeholders to open and examine such copies so transmitted, and compare the returns from the respective counties, and declare the person having the greatest number of votes in the whole district duly elected in the manner and form now prescribed by law; and shall record the same in his office, and transmit a copy thereof to the person so elected, and a like copy to the Clerk of the House to which such person is elected, to be preserved by him; which certified copy shall be sufficient evidence of his election, and entitle him to his seat."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. What is the date of that law?

The CLERK. The title-page of the book is, "Acts of the General Assembly, passed at the regular session, held December 2, 1861, at the city of Wheeling."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. If it was passed by that Legislature, the reason is still stronger. I ask for the vote on laying on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I should be very glad to learn from the gentleman from West Virginia how many counties were represented in that Legislature?

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. About fifty, as I understand. However, the question as to the validity of that Legislature was fully settled in the last Congress.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Al-ley, Allison, Ancona, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McAlister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKenney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James K. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Colfax, Cottman, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Shannon, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Thayer, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, and Woodbridge—73.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Clerk, have a quorum of members answered to their names?

The CLERK. A quorum have answered to their names.

LOUISIANA MEMBERS.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise for the purpose of asking a question. I want to know whether there has been any notice of contest received as to the members from Louisiana, or any protest against their admission from any official personages?

The CLERK. The Clerk of the House of Representatives has received a letter from a gentleman styling himself attorney general, appointed by the military governor; and he has also received a memorial signed by some fifty or sixty gentlemen representing themselves as the "Free State Committee of the State of Louisiana," which, not being a close corporation, he has laid away; still, the gentleman can have them if he wants them. [Laughter.]

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Clerk, I move that the House now proceed viva voce to the election of a Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, nominated Mr. COLFAX, of Indiana. [Applause.]

The CLERK. The Clerk cannot preserve order. Those who make the disorder know that he has no power to put it down.

Mr. PENDLETON nominated Mr. COX, of Ohio.

Mr. ANCONA nominated Mr. DAWSON, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WADSWORTH nominated Mr. MALLORY, of Kentucky.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, nominated his colleague, Mr. STEBBINS.

Mr. RADFORD nominated Mr. KING, of Missouri.

The Clerk appointed Messrs. DAWES, PENDLETON, POMEROY, and WADSWORTH tellers.

Mr. COTTMAN nominated Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri.

The House proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker, with the following result, which was announced by Mr. PENDLETON on behalf of the tellers:

Whole number of votes cast, 181; necessary to a choice, 91; of which—

Mr. Colfax received.....	101
Mr. Cox.....	42
Mr. Dawson.....	42
Mr. Mallory.....	10
Mr. Stebbins.....	8
Mr. King.....	6
Mr. Blair, of Missouri.....	2
Mr. Stiles.....	1

The following is the vote in detail:

For Mr. Colfax—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, William G. Brown, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge.

For Mr. Cox—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, Cravens, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, William G. Steele, Sweat, Voorhees, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White.

For Mr. Dawson—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Coffroth, Cox, Dennison, Philip Johnson, Lazear, McAllister, William H. Miller, Samuel J. Randall, Stiles, and Strouse.

For Mr. Mallory—Messrs. Brooks, Grider, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, King, James S. Rollins, Stuart, Wadsworth, Ward, and Yeaman.

For Mr. Stebbins—Messrs. Ganson, Griswold, Kernan, Nelson, Odell, Pruyn, John B. Steele, and Winfield.

For Mr. King—Messrs. Chanler, Hall, Mallory, Radford, Scott, and Fernando Wood.

For Mr. Blair, of Missouri—Messrs. Cottman and Field.

For Mr. Stiles—Mr. Benjamin Wood.

The CLERK then announced that SCHUYLER COLFAX, one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana, having received a majority of all the votes given, was duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress. [Applause.]

Whereupon, at the suggestion of the Clerk, Messrs. DAWSON, of Pennsylvania, and COX, of Ohio, conducted Mr. COLFAX to the chair, when he addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: To-day will be marked in American history as the opening of a Congress destined to face and settle the most important questions of the century; and during whose existence the rebellion, which has passed its culmination, will, beyond all question, thanks to our Army and Navy and Administration, die a deserved death. Not only will your constituents watch with the strictest scrutiny your deliberations here, but the friends of liberty, to the most distant lands, will be interested spectators of your acts in this greater than Roman forum. I invoke you to approach these grave questions with the calm thoughtfulness of statesmen, freeing your discussions from that acerbity which mars instead of advancing legislation, and with unshaken reliance on that divine Power which gave victory to those who formed this Union, and can give even greater victory to those who are seeking to save it from destruction by the hand of the parricide and traitor. I invoke you also to remember that sacred truth, which all history verifies, that "they who rule not in righteousness shall perish from the earth." Thanking you with a grateful heart for this distinguished mark of your confidence and regard, and appealing to you all for that support and forbearance by the aid of which alone I can hope to succeed, I am now ready to take the oath of office, and enter upon the duties you have assigned me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, then administered to the Speaker elect the following oath:

I, Schuyler Colfax, do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

The speech of the Speaker was interrupted by applause; and there was applause when the oath was administered, and during the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, invested by the rules with the authority for the preservation of the order and decorum of the House, appeals to members not to indulge in manifestations of approval or disapproval. The Chair will state to the spectators in the gallery that this is a deliberative assembly, and that no manifestation of applause or dissent can be allowed. Each doorkeeper will promptly take such persons from the galleries, for the order of the House must be maintained at all hazards.

The Speaker then proceeded to administer the oath to the members elect.

When the names of the Representatives from Louisiana [Messrs. BAKER, COTTMAN, and FIELD] were called—

Mr. STEVENS said: I object to the swearing in of the members from Louisiana. I understand that it is the last State to be called, but, as there are several Territories, I move to postpone the question on swearing them in until to-morrow, so that the territorial Delegates may be sworn in.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The names of three Representatives from Louisiana appearing on the roll as made out by the Clerk of the last House of Representatives, and their names being called for the purpose of their presenting themselves at the Speaker's desk to be sworn, the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that their names be passed over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I wish the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania would permit the House to go on in the ordinary course of organization. He sees from the numerous votes given to-day that he and his party friends have control of the House; that there has been little or no opposition to them, except in mere form, and I think the public interests and the convenience of all of us will be best consulted by following the ordinary precedents of organization.

I know nothing of the right of these Representatives from Louisiana to seats upon this floor otherwise than from these credentials; but it is very evident from them that they come here with the same right as other gentlemen holding seats upon this floor, and the introduction of extraordinary motions now can only tend to hinder and delay the organization.

The gentleman is sure of the Clerk; he is sure of all the other officers of the House; he is sure of the Committee of Elections, to whom the credentials of the honorable gentlemen from Louisiana will be referred. Why not, then, if only in the exercise of party magnanimity, follow the precedents, which are of the highest importance to the organization of the House and to the country, especially in revolutionary times? Why not wait until the Committee of Elections shall be appointed, and let the credentials of the honorable members from Louisiana take the usual course of reference at the proper time to that committee? and if they have a right to seats upon this floor it will be accorded to them, and if not they will be rejected.

I submit to the honorable gentleman that it is not worth while to interrupt the organization of the House by pressing this matter to-day. He knows, as an old parliamentarian, as a member of many years' standing, that it is not in his power to settle great questions and principles, which may perchance affect the existence of States, on mere motions of this sort.

I appeal to the honorable gentleman once more, as I did before, when he yielded with great good sense, to let these credentials take the usual course, and let these gentlemen take the oath, and then let us go on and choose the other officers of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. This is not an extraordinary motion, but a very ordinary one. Where a member believes from the face of the documents read that they are in truth no credentials, as in this instance, where the papers are signed by a man whom nobody in the United States ever heard of as Governor, and with his private seal attached, and where I am also well assured no pretense of an election was ever held, it has not been customary to swear in the members until it has been determined that they are entitled to seats. A large amount of mileage and per diem is involved, and many a man, I am sorry to say, has come here from far distant parts of this nation under the pretense of claiming a seat, when he knew he had no claim at all to one, for the mere purpose of getting the mileage.

I do not say that that is the case with these gentlemen. But I say that last year, when two gentlemen came from Louisiana and claimed seats here, who, in my judgment, had no right here—but which judgment was wrong, I presume, for the House overruled it—the same course was pursued with regard to them that I now propose. They were two Republican members. I mention that because something has been said about party power in the House. They were not permitted to be sworn in until they had exhibited their credentials to the Committee of Elections, and that committee had passed upon them. I propose the same course now with reference to these gentlemen.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that it has been the custom of the House heretofore to exclude members coming in this way at the beginning of the organization, and not to allow them to be sworn. I well remember that at the opening of the last Congress, at the extra session, when Mr. Upton, of Virginia, came here, and when I objected to his being sworn because he was not a citizen of Virginia, because he was a citizen and voter in Ohio, and for other reasons, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the members on the other side of the House, thought that he ought to be sworn in, and the question of his right to a seat passed over until the organization of the House should be completed. That was done, and Mr. Upton remained here acting as a member of the House for six months, and drawing his pay for that time, and then was turned out of the House, there not being a shadow of a pretense that he had ever been elected a member. That is one precedent. There may be precedents on both sides of the question. We had better lean to the side of fairness, and let the credentials go to the Committee of Elections, as they appear to be fair on their faces.

I would ask the gentleman, what was the condition of things in the case of the Representatives from Louisiana in the last Congress? When they came here at the end of the session there was no objection made to them. I believe their credentials came in and were sent to the Committee of Elections.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House voted for the admission of these Louisiana members at the last session. All we ask is that the question may be investigated fairly by the proper committee of the House, and that the House may have the opportunity of deciding upon the facts as they are presented.

Mr. DAWES. That is all we ask.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Ohio, I think, is mistaken in two of the facts which he states. I think the members from Louisiana came here at very nearly the commencement of the last session, and that they went off and stumped New England for two months before they came back and had their case decided.

Mr. COX. Yes, they went off and stumped New England, and that brought them in speedily. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. And then we took the same course with them that it is proposed to take now. The other fact stated by the gentleman, to which I referred, is in regard to the precedents. He may refer to this side of the House as setting the precedents he speaks of, but not to me.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether, in case these gentlemen go to New England, and stump it for four months, he will then agree to admit them. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. If they would go and stump Kentucky for emancipation I do not know but I might. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind gentlemen in the galleries that these manifestations of applause, which are permitted in tumultuous assemblages, cannot be tolerated here. The Chair will endeavor to enforce the rules strictly, and hopes the House will sustain him in it.

Mr. STEVENS. I was going on to say, when the gentleman from Kentucky interrupted me by his argumentum ad hominem, that because this side of the House acquiesced in the admission of any members from the State of Louisiana, or from any other State which by its Legislature had gone into rebellion, he must not say that I acquiesced in such a precedent. I have never been guilty of anything of the kind.

I will now modify my motion so as to refer these credentials to the Committee of Elections, and that the swearing in of the members be postponed until some other day; and on that I call the previous question.

Mr. COX. I will make a suggestion, if the gentleman will allow me. I do not care to raise a question of order.

Mr. STEVENS. I should be very glad to hear the gentleman's suggestion, but I think I had better not yield. I will hear it privately.

Mr. COX. I raise the question of order, then, that there is no Committee on Privileges and Elections to which the credentials can be referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The uniform practice of the House has been to refer matters to committees before they were raised.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he modify his motion so as to refer the credentials to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. I will modify my motion in that way, though it is entirely unnecessary. The standing rules of the House provide for a Committee of Elections. I have no wish to be discourteous to the gentleman from Ohio, and will withdraw my demand for the previous question, and hear his suggestion.

Mr. COX. I do not suppose anything I can say will change the intentions of gentlemen on the other side of the House. I was going to correct the gentleman from Pennsylvania in one or two particulars. I think it is not the fact that the members from Louisiana came here at the organization of the last Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I said near the commencement of the last session.

Mr. COX. It was not until after the organization.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no; certainly not; but they came here at the last session early in December. While I am up I will state one fact—I am sorry I am obliged to—which may have some effect. It is, that these gentlemen from Louisiana have already been to the Sergeant-at-Arms to draw their mileage and per diem. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to lay the resolution on the table; and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is, at any time.

Mr. BROOKS. I make that motion, and demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. J. C. ALLEN; and being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Gravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kableisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, LeBlond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKenney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, McBride, McClurg, Melndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—101.

So the motion was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the adoption of the motion of Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—71.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The following Delegates from the Territories were then sworn in:

From New Mexico—FRANCISCO PEREA.

From Utah—JOHN F. KINNEY.

From Washington—GEORGE E. COLE.

From Nebraska—SAMUEL G. DAILY.

From Colorado—HIRAM P. BENNET.

From Nevada—GORDON N. MOTT.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I see that the Clerk has placed the name of Mr. Todd on the roll as Delegate from Dakota. If there are any credentials of Mr. Todd here, I should like to have them read, and in the mean time I send up credentials of Mr. Jayne, which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. COX. I ask that Mr. Todd's credentials may first be read.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the Clerk has sent for them, and they have not yet been brought in. I suppose there has not been time enough to prepare them. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, I will simply say that I do not think there are any such credentials that are in form, and I believe the Clerk so admitted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Is there any motion now pending before the House? If there is not, the gentleman from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move to substitute the name of Mr. Jayne for that of Mr. Todd.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that the credentials of both claimants be read to the House before any vote is taken.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DAKOTA TERRITORY, EXECUTIVE OFFICE:

I, John Hutchinson, secretary and acting Governor of the Territory of Dakota, do hereby certify that, according to the canvass made by the territorial canvassers on the 24th day of October, 1862, of the votes for Delegate to Congress, William Jayne had a majority over J. B. S. Todd of sixteen votes, and that, subsequent to said canvass, returns were made to this office in due form of votes from Pembina district as follows, to wit: number of votes cast for J. B. S. Todd, one hundred and twenty-five; for William Jayne, nineteen; which said votes were not included in the canvass made by the territorial canvassers, but are now on file in this office.

Witness my hand, and the great seal of the Territory. Done at Yankton, this 15th August, A. D. 1863.

JOHN HUTCHINSON,

Secretary and Acting Governor.

DAKOTA TERRITORY, SECRETARY'S OFFICE:

I hereby certify that I have not issued a certificate of election to any person as Delegate to Congress from this Territory; that there is no record in this office of any having been issued by any person, and that I have no official knowledge of the territorial seal having been affixed to any such certificate.

Witness my hand, and the great seal of the Territory. Done at Yankton, this 26th day of September, A. D. 1863.

JOHN HUTCHINSON, Secretary.

PROCLAMATION
To the People of Dakota Territory.

I, John Hutchinson, secretary and acting Governor of the Territory of Dakota, do hereby proclaim:

That at a general election held on the 1st day of September, 1862, in said Territory, William Jayne received a majority of the votes cast for Delegate to Congress, and was therefore duly elected Delegate to the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States; that Justus Townsend received a majority of the votes cast for territorial Auditor, and was duly elected as such; and that S. G. Ingh received a majority of the votes cast for territorial Treasurer, and was therefore duly elected as such.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Yankton, this 20th day of November, A. D. 1863.

JOHN HUTCHINSON,
Secretary and Acting Governor.

DAKOTA TERRITORY, SECRETARY'S OFFICE:

I, John Hutchinson, secretary of the Territory of Dakota, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the Proclamation issued by me on the 29th day of November, A. D. 1862, and by me recorded, and now on record in this office.

Witness my hand, and the great seal of the Territory. Done at Yankton, this 17th day of June, A. D. 1863.

JOHN HUTCHINSON.

Mr. LOVEJOY. That is sufficient to show that Mr. Jayne is entitled to his seat. I therefore move that his name be substituted for that of Mr. Todd; and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I think that the whole subject had better be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MALLORY. Before that is done I would ask whether a certificate was not sent to the Clerk before the one last read?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I understand the state of the case to be this: Mr. Jayne was Governor of the Territory, and it was made his duty to certify the election. He did certify to his own election, and the certificate is in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. MALLORY. It has not been read, and it seems to me that it ought to be.

The certificate was read, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, YANKTON, DAKOTA TERRITORY:

William Jayne, Governor of said Territory, to all whom these presents shall come, sends greeting:

William Jayne, having received the largest number of votes cast at the general election for Delegate in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States from the Territory of Dakota, held on the 1st day of September, A. D. 1862, is hereby declared duly elected said Delegate in Congress from the Territory aforesaid.

This certificate shall be, and is, the certificate of the said election as Delegate in Congress from this Territory in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused to be affixed the great seal of the Territory of Dakota. Done at Yankton, this 5th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1863.

WILLIAM JAYNE,

Governor of Dakota Territory.

Mr. MALLORY. Is that countersigned by the secretary of the Territory?

Mr. LOVEJOY. The law does not require any such signature. I move that the whole subject be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOVEJOY moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I send to the Clerk's table a resolution, which I ask may be adopted. The 47th rule provides that the rules of the last House shall remain as the rules of the House, unless otherwise ordered. My resolution will put the question beyond doubt, and reserve the privilege of amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Seventh Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered.

Resolved further, That a committee of five, to consist of the Speaker and four members to be named by him, be appointed, to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, who shall have the right to report at any time such amendments on the revision of the same that they may think proper; and such report, when made, shall be considered by the House as a special order.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to making anything a special order at this early day of the session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that the objection cannot prevail.

The SPEAKER. It is a valid objection to that part of the proposition providing for a special order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That assumes that the House is governed by the rules of the last House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only attain his object by moving a suspension of the rules, this being Monday.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Illinois, I suppose, is aware that the 47th rule provides that "these rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives for the present and succeeding Congresses until otherwise ordered."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The question arises whether the last Congress can make rules for this Congress. I will modify my resolution by striking out the part in reference to its being made a special order.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJOR GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I give notice that at some future day I will introduce a bill to revive the grade of Lieutenant General in the United States Army; and also a joint resolution providing for striking a medal for Major General Grant, and for a vote of the thanks of Congress to him and to the officers and men serving under him.

PUNISHMENT OF SLAVEHOLDING.

Mr. LOVEJOY. And I give notice that I shall introduce a bill, at an early day, providing for the punishment of slaveholding in the United States and throughout the Territories thereof.

RECIPROCITY TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. MORRILL. I give notice that I shall introduce a joint resolution terminating the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at ten minutes to four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 8, 1863.

Rev. D. V. McLEAN, D. D., of New Jersey, offered the following prayer:

Most high and holy God! We adore Thee as God over all, blessed forever and ever, and with humble reverence we bow in Thy presence and worship Thee. We come to Thee as sinners, but we rejoice in the precious truth that God's dear Son died for sinners. Oh, for His sake, look down upon us and bless us. Bless the Senate of the United States now convened, its Presiding Officer, and all its members, present or absent, their families from whom they may be separated, and grant to each one of them that wisdom that cometh down from above, that whatever is done by this body may tend to promote God's glory and the best interests of this great nation. Bless the House of Representatives; make them all wise men, that they may know, like the sons of Issachar, what Israel ought to do. We humbly pray for the President of the United States, that God would in mercy preserve his life and his health. Restore him to health, we beseech Thee, if it please Thee, and so replenish him with heavenly wisdom that in all the difficult and trying circumstances in which he may be placed he may faithfully discharge his duty to God and to this great people. We pray, heavenly Father, for Thy special blessing to rest upon our country in this the time of our trouble and of our tribulation. In all our difficulties and in all our dangers, blessed God, we apply to Thee. Stretch out thine almighty arm and save us, O Thou who savest by Thy right hand all them that put their trust in Thee, against those that rise up against them. We pray for God's blessing upon our Army and our Navy, upon all who are appointed to devise means for the pacification of this land and for the perpetuity of our Union. We pray for firmness and decision in those whose duty it is to execute these measures; and humbly beseech God to spare the effusion of human blood. Grant us, O Lord, again the blessings of union and peace and prosperity. We humbly pray God to bless our wounded and sick soldiers; have them in Thy holy keeping; support and comfort and sustain them in their sufferings. Bless the stricken hearts throughout our land that are mourning the slain, and raise them up friends and helpers. We pray Thee, O God, to guide us all by Thy counsel, and afterwards receive us to glory, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to present the memorial of Patrick W. Douglas, praying for a pension; and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no such committee at this time. The Chair will suggest to Senators that perhaps it would be more desirable that they should retain their memorials until the committees shall be announced. The memorials can, however, be received, and lie upon the table.

Mr. NESMITH. Very well. Let that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie on the table, to be referred at the appropriate time.

Mr. COLLAMER afterwards said: I desire to present a memorial signed by the Governor, lieutenant governor, judges of the supreme court, and members of the Legislature of Vermont, praying for an examination of the ambulance system of the armies of the United States, and the adoption of such improvements (if any are needed) as will promote its efficiency and usefulness; which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred when the committee shall have been announced. It will lie on the table until that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to present the memorial of Mrs. Evelina Porter, widow of the late Commodore David Porter, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Pensions when that committee shall be appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made at that time.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WILKINSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting pensions to those who were wounded in the late Indian massacres in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. HALE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting a pension to Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, of the United States Army.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to increase the bounty to volunteers, and make an appropriation for the same.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLARK asked, and by unanimous consent (previous notice not having been given) obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1) granting a pension to John L. Burns, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

MONEYS DUE TO DECEASED SOLDIERS.

Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary to facilitate the payment of the back pay, bounties, and pensions of deceased soldiers.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution, and ask that it lie on the table for the present:

Resolved, That the refusal of the rebel authorities to exchange negro soldiers, or their officers, or any class of prisoners from the United States Army, should not prevent or suspend exchanges by our military authorities for any other class of prisoners; and justice, policy, and humanity demand that, as fast as it can be done, our brave and suffering countrymen should be delivered from their captivity.

SEAT OF HON. ROBERT WILSON.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no other morning business, I ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether Hon. Robert Wilson is still a Senator from the State of Missouri.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will be regarded as before the Senate. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What disposition is made of the resolution? I did not hear.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a resolution of inquiry, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report the facts. I will state to the Senator from Maine that the question of the right of Mr. Wilson to a seat involves also the question of pay and mileage, and it is important to have the matter decided in order to guide the course of the officers of the Senate. There may be many questions arising in similar cases, and therefore I thought we ought to have the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary to settle the matter. As far as the right to the seat is concerned, it is a matter of comparatively small importance, as Mr. Brown will no doubt be here in a day or two, but it involves the question of pay and mileage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So far as I am concerned, I object entirely to recognizing Mr. Wilson as a Senator even until his successor comes, and I think that the Senate is in full possession of all the facts, and may decide the case without a reference to the committee. There are some things of which we must take cognizance anyhow, and I am unwilling to establish what would seem to be a very bad precedent, or (if not establishing it) to recognize any former one that I believe to be entirely unfounded in right. I do not know that I shall object to letting the matter go to the Committee on the Judiciary to be inquired into; though I hardly see any necessity for that; but I do seriously object to the appearance or recognition of Mr. Wilson as a Senator from Missouri, even until his successor appears. I believe that matter has been settled too often to admit of any dispute.

Mr. SHERMAN. I agree with the Senator from Maine in regard to the precedent, if I am correctly informed; but I thought it better, as the right of a member, or an alleged member, was involved, that the Committee on the Judiciary should give their opinion, not to settle the matter for us, but for the accounting officers of the Senate. I have no objection, however, if the Senate so desires, to taking a vote directly on the right of Mr. Wilson to a seat.

Mr. HALE. I did not happen to have the good fortune to hear the remarks of the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Ohio. In regard to this matter I have but one feeling. I do not see what will be gained by referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary to have a report made and voted upon. That has been done, and done repeatedly, and I do not see how another report on the same facts will mend the record as it now stands. This question was raised in the case of the gentleman alluded to by the honorable Senator from Vermont, in the case of Judge Phelps, and was elaborately considered. It so happened at that time that the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, contained a member who would shortly after be situated in a condition exactly like that of Judge Phelps, and who was then expected soon to be in that condition. A committee, made up of members one of whom it was known would soon be in the same situation—I allude to Mr. Williams—presented a report in favor of Judge Phelps's right. The Senate reversed the decision of the committee; and presently the same question precisely did come up in the case of Mr. Williams who made that report, and it was again voted upon almost unanimously by the Senate. The question has been referred, considered, deliberated upon, acted upon, and if the Senate can make a solemn judgment that will bind themselves, they have done it repeatedly in this case, and I think that a proper degree of self-respect requires of the Senate, until there is some new consideration presented, to adhere to their own repeated decision.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, as a personal friend of the late Senator from Missouri, and for whom I entertain great respect, I desire to make one remark. The law of this question has been settled for a long time. All old Senators know that this gentleman has not a present right. I am very sorry that he thinks he has; but all persons who have studied parliamentary law as it has been administered in this Republic for years and years, know that he has not a right to a place in the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I am, perhaps, not sufficiently advised of the facts in this case to form an opinion. I think the whole question, however, depends upon a single fact, and that is whether the Legislature of Missouri has adjourned or whether it is now in session. If the Legislature of Missouri only took a recess last spring, and has never adjourned sine die, I think that the Senator from Missouri is entitled to his seat until his successor shall appear here to be sworn. I think the precedents are that way. I think the precedents are that when the Executive of a State appoints a Senator, he holds that position until the Legislature meets and elects his successor, or the Legislature adjourns. If the Legislature adjourns without having elected a Senator, the presumption is that that sovereign State waives its right to have a Senator on this floor; but until the Legislature has a session and adjourns, I believe that the Senator appointed by the Executive holds his place here. Now, if I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] yesterday, he said that the Legislature was now in session; that in March last it adjourned to a then future day. I understood by that adjournment to a day, that it took a recess. If it were only a recess, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Wilson) is entitled to his seat until the person elected by the Legislature to fill the vacancy, Mr. Brown, presents his credentials here. I confess that I should like to have this question go to the Committee on the Judiciary, that they may have an opportunity of investigating and reporting the whole facts, or the single fact to which I have referred, for there is but one that is of any weight to my mind.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I am really quite indifferent about it. I simply rose for the purpose of saying that I considered the matter very clear, though not upon grounds that other gentlemen assume. I was one of the twelve that voted in favor of the right of Mr. Phelps to a seat in the Senate under the appointment of the Governor until his successor was appointed, whether the Legislature in the mean time had adjourned or not. I listened very carefully to the debate in that case. I think the argument of Judge Phelps was about the ablest I ever heard upon any question, and it convinced me of his right; that the true construction of the Constitution was, that a person appointed a Senator by the Governor of a State to fill a vacancy occurring during the recess of the Legislature, held until his successor was elected by the Legislature. That was my opinion; it remains so. But, sir, the Senate by a very large majority decided otherwise; they decided that if the Legislature had met and adjourned without an election, the right of the person appointed by the Governor ceased; he ceased to be a Senator. I understand further, (and of that I am not fully aware; I am so informed by a Senator,) that in the subsequent case of Mr. Williams, from New Hampshire, the Legislature had met and adjourned over without electing a successor, but had not finally adjourned, and that that distinguishes his case. But the Senate held in that case that the meeting of the Legislature, and an adjournment to another day, a distant day, without an election, operated in the same way. I state this on information, but I do not know whether it is correct or not—

Mr. FOOT. It is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Vermont informs me that that is the case. That would apply, if there had been no election, in the case before us of Mr. Wilson. But, sir, I put it upon another ground. I hold that the Senator thus appointed is entitled to his seat until his successor is elected; and that is this case. We know (and gentlemen, in settling these questions, must be understood to know such things,) we know very well, at least as well as we know that there was an adjournment of the Legislature, that a successor was chosen. We know that there is no dispute about that fact. We know that before this Congress met, in November last, the Legislature elected Mr. Brown to fill this very place. That is a matter of common information. Notwithstanding that, Mr. Wilson, knowing that fact, and knowing, too, that the gentleman thus elected would be here in a short time, not knowing but that he would be here on the first day of the session to take his seat, chose to travel on here from the State of Missouri to take a seat in this body. With what view? Simply and solely—I can put no other construction upon it—that he might put into his pocket the amount of money allowed for the travel from the State of Missouri, on the technical ground that his successor has not appeared. Now we see how, if we could suppose such a thing possible between honorable gentlemen—I do not suppose it—that these two gentlemen might come on here both at the same time to take their seats, and that Mr. Brown, to accommodate Mr. Wilson, who has not been elected, might say, "Go in, sir, take your seat on the first day, and I will stand back; draw your pay and travel, and I will come in on the second day." Such things might be if they were not honorable men.

But you see, sir, the ground upon which I put it is this: when Mr. Wilson knew perfectly well, as we all know, as everybody knows, that his successor was elected before this Congress met, the idea that he should come here on any technicality to take his seat in this body is entirely conclusive with me as to any right whatever to draw his pay for doing so. I resist to the utmost the precedent; we ought never to establish it. It is an entirely new case, so far as that is concerned, for there has been none before in the history of this body, where a gentleman, knowing that his successor was elected and about to take his seat, undertook to come on and hold a seat here for a day, or two until the successor appeared. The thing is unknown to the parliamentary history of this body, and we ought never to give any sanction to it under any circumstances. I presume Mr. Wilson has acted under what seems to me a misapprehension in regard to it; but the facts as they stand, known to everybody, known to every member of the Senate, are enough to show that we ought to be very careful how we give any sanction to such a thing under any circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear the resolution read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend that it will be premature to refer the question to the Committee on the Judiciary, the committees not having been formed as yet. It really does seem to me that this is a question which can be settled in the Senate at once; and, by way of getting at the sense of the Senate, I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting "that Hon. Robert Wilson is not entitled to a seat in the Senate."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask whether the credentials of Mr. Brown have been presented to this body and filed. I believe he is not present personally. Is there any evidence here of his election?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the credentials have not been presented here.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to say, by way of being understood exactly in my position, that I understand it has been the rule in all bodies of this high order, that they must understand things historically as well as by the presentment of evidence. If a Senator knows by proper testimony that another Senator is not entitled to his place, he is bound to affirm it by his action in the Senate. This is no court of law, where the technicalities of the common law obtain, nor is it any inferior organization. It is a body where the right has to be maintained in its highest form. We know there is another Senator entitled to this place, and we cannot ignore that fact; we have no right to do so.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. Robert Wilson is not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

ELECTION OF A CHAPLAIN.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That at one o'clock, p. m., to-morrow, the Senate will proceed to the election of a Chaplain for the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That leave be granted P. Hickey to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if there has been any adverse report in that case?

Mr. CONNESS. I will state, for the information of the Senate, that the petition and papers referred to were presented in 1858. There was no adverse report on the subject. They are now in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate. The petitioner desires to possess them, in order to present his claim to the Court of Claims. That is the purpose in asking leave of the Senate to withdraw them.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no objection to that. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that the party has the right to withdraw his papers under the rule of the Senate. The Chair, however, will put the question on the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Hon. EDWARD McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled, and had elected SCHUYLER COLFAX, one of the Representatives from Indiana, Speaker, and were now ready to proceed to business.

The message also announced that the House had appointed a committee of three, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and that Congress was ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make; and that the committee consisted of Mr. ELIHU B. WASHBURNE of Illinois, Mr. F. A. PIKE of Maine, and Mr. J. A. GRISWOLD of New York.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following order; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE. Is there any business before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not.

Mr. HALE. Then I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States having returned, the Vice President resumed the chair.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, the committee appointed for that purpose have, according to order, waited upon the President of the United States, and informed him of the presence of a quorum of each House of Congress, and of the organization of the House of Representatives, and that the two Houses were ready to receive any communication which the President might be pleased to make to them. The committee received for answer from the President that he would communicate his annual message to the two Houses of Congress to-morrow, at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, December 8, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may make.

The SPEAKER. The Senate must be informed of the organization of the House as well as the President of the United States.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I make the usual motion, that the Clerk of the House be requested to inform the Senate that the House has organized and is ready to proceed with the transaction of the public business.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF CLERK.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the election of officers to complete the organization of the House.

Mr. MOORHEAD nominated EDWARD McPHERSON, of Pennsylvania, for the position of Clerk of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask leave to present the name of Hon. EMERSON ETHERIDGE, of Tennessee. He has been in that position, and I think ably, during the last Congress. I do not believe that the breath of calumny has even whispered a charge against him. He has been guilty of no dereliction of office; but, on the contrary, has, I understand, saved to the Government at least one third of the expenditures of the Clerks of the two preceding Houses of Representatives. I believe that fidelity at a time like this should be rewarded; and I think that gentlemen upon the other side will agree with me in that belief, and that they will at once withdraw their nominee. I give them this chance to be magnanimous, perhaps the last one they will have.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Speaker, it certainly requires a great deal—I hardly know how to characterize the appeal just made to us—but I was going to say that it required a good deal of brass to make it. We owe no magnanimity to a man whose recent action connected with the organization of this House could only proceed from motives the most unworthy, I may almost say infamous.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this levity on the part of the gentleman from Kentucky allowable, according to the rules of the House?

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that I indulged in levity, for I was in earnest when I nominated Hon. EMERSON ETHERIDGE. I was only in jest when I expected magnanimity from the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. MOORHEAD, MALLORY, SPAULDING, and GOOCH as tellers.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Clerk, with the following result: whole number of votes, 171; necessary to a choice, 86; of which—

Edward McPherson received.....	102
Emerson Etheridge.....	69

The following is the vote in detail:

For Mr. McPherson—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge.

For Mr. Etheridge—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman.

EDWARD McPHERSON, of Pennsylvania, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected Clerk of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

OTHER OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a resolution which, if there be no objection, I will propose for adoption, containing the names of gentlemen for the other offices of the House. Of course it can only be offered by unanimous consent. I do not desire to press it if any one objects. I ask that it be read for information.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That William S. King, of Minnesota, be declared elected Postmaster; Nehemiah G. Ordway, of New Hampshire, be declared elected Sergeant-at-Arms; and Ira Goodenow, of New York, be declared elected Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. COX. I object to that.

Mr. DA WES. I will not press the resolution.

CONTESTANTS.

Mr. STILES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the several gentlemen who shall have contests for seats pending before this House shall have the privilege of the floor during such contests, with the right to speak with regard to their respective cases.

Mr. STILES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that a quorum of the Senate had appeared and were ready to proceed to business; also, that Mr. Foor, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. NESMITH had been appointed a committee on the part of the Senate to join such committee as should be appointed on the part of the House to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that the two Houses were organized and ready to proceed to business.

ELECTION OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the election of Sergeant-at-Arms, and that nominations were now in order.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I nominate Nehemiah G. Ordway, of New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLMAN. I nominate that sterling patriot, Hon. Edward Ball, of Ohio.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I nominate Adam J. Glossbrenner, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. At the request of Mr. Ball I withdraw his name.

The SPEAKER appointed the following gentlemen tellers to count the votes: Messrs. ROLLINS of New Hampshire, RANDALL of Pennsylvania, SMITH, and BEAMAN.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Sergeant-at-Arms, with the following result: whole number of votes, 169; necessary to a choice, 85; of which—

Nehemiah G. Ordway received.....	100
Adam J. Glossbrenner.....	45
S. C. Benton.....	14
Edward Ball.....	10

The following is the vote in detail:

For Mr. Ordway—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge.

For Mr. Glossbrenner—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Coffroth, Dawson, Dennison, English, Finck, Ganson, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Long, Marcy, McDowell, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Perry, Samuel J. For Mr. Ball—Messrs. Cravens, Grider, Harding, Holman, Kalbfleisch, Law, Mallory, James S. Rollins, Wadsworth, and Yeaman.

NEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY, of New Hampshire, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

ELECTION OF DOORKEEPER.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the election of Doorkeeper, for which nominations are now in order.

Mr. FENTON nominated Ira Goodenow, of New York.

Mr. NELSON nominated Felix McCluskey, of New York.

Mr. RADFORD nominated Robert Wilson, of New York.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. FENTON, NELSON, RADFORD, and RANDALL of Kentucky, tellers to count the votes.

The House then proceeded to vote for a Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, with the following result: whole number of votes cast, 156; necessary to a choice, 79; of which—

Ira Goodenow received.....	98

For Mr. Pelton—Messrs. Nelson and Stebbins.
For Mr. Kidd—Messrs. Radford and Winfield.

WILLIAM S. KING, of Minnesota, having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared duly elected Postmaster of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the joint committee of both Houses appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that both Houses were organized and prepared to receive any communication he desired to make, reported that the committee had performed that duty, and that the President had stated that he would, at half past twelve o'clock to-morrow, send his annual message to Congress.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM VIRGINIA.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of Messrs. SEGAR, KITCHEN, and CHANDLER, Representatives elect from the State of Virginia, and moved that they be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

MEDAL TO GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant, and the officers and soldiers under his command, during the rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck, to be presented to Major General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America.

The joint resolution received its several readings, and was passed unanimously.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the House to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL AND REFERENCE OF PAPERS.

Mr. FENTON asked and obtained unanimous consent to have withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Court of Claims, the Court of Claims report, and bill (C. C. H. R. 256) accompanying it.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. PIKE offered the usual resolution for the drawing of seats by members.

UNION PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. COX. Before taking a vote on that resolution, I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully and urgently requested to take immediate steps for the exchange of such of our prisoners as are now confined in the prisons of the South; and that he be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence in the War Department with reference to the exchange of prisoners.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that resolution should lie over for a day.

Mr. COX. I think not. The matter is very urgent. These prisoners need our care more than we do ourselves. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois—

The SPEAKER. This debate can only be indulged by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he doubts that they have been taken care of as much as they can be.

Mr. COX. I think not.

Mr. STEVENS. That is a question of delicacy.

Mr. COX. It can do no harm to urge upon the President of the United States action in this matter. At the beginning of this contest there was no cartel for the exchange of prisoners. I introduced a resolution here which passed this House almost unanimously, and which also passed the Senate, to facilitate that exchange. The pirates who were imprisoned in Philadelphia were at once given up by the President; and our soldiers who had been detained in retaliation for their imprisonment were also released. That was an act of humanity which Congress did properly attend to at that time. I know, Mr. Speaker, that the condition of some of these soldiers even yet, notwithstanding the attention and charity of men at the North, is almost too horrible to be conceived.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated it could only be indulged in by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. COX. Only one word more—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that the gentleman knows very well the Administration has done everything that could be done, consistent with honor, to effect an exchange of prisoners.

Mr. COX. Have I impugned anything the Administration has done? Cannot one express some earnestness, some anxiety about this matter, without gentlemen telling us, "Oh, you impugn the Administration?" The gentleman is too swift in making his charges.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman that debate cannot be indulged in, objection being made.

Mr. COX. Well, I wish simply to say that I think that before members adopt a resolution to draw for seats, and provide for our own convenience, we had better see if we cannot do something for our suffering prisoners.

DRAWING FOR SEATS—AGAIN.

The resolution submitted by Mr. PIKE was agreed to.

In execution of the order of the House, the members and delegates retired outside the Hall, and, as their names were drawn, reappeared and selected their seats.

THE ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SPAULDING. I give notice to the House that I will on to-morrow, or some subsequent day, introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," by repealing the commutation clause and the clause that provides for distinction of classes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that, under the rules, notices of bills must be filed with the Clerk; and if they wish to have them appear in the Globe, a memorandum should be handed to the reporters.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, presented the memorial of C. W. Carrigan, contesting the seat of M. Russell Thayer.

Also, the memorial of John Kline, contesting the seat of Leonard Myers; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

On motion of Mr. STROUSE, (at ten minutes after three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 9, 1863.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Treasurer of the United States, communicating, in obedience to law, a certified copy of his account of receipts and expenditures for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter of the Treasurer of the United States, communicating, in obedience to law, copies of his accounts with the United States for the third and fourth quarters of the fiscal year 1861, and the first and second quarters of the year 1862, as adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut in favor of such a modification of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," that town organizations in that State may have credit for the number sent on former calls for men; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for the payment of the officers of the 4th and 5th Indian regiments.

He also gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for auditing the claims for losses of property in the recent raid upon the city of Lawrence, Kansas.

Mr. POWELL gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to prevent officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States from interfering with elections in the States.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2) granting a pension to Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and laid on the table temporarily until the organization of the standing committees.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

At half past twelve o'clock, Mr. JOHN G. NICOLAY, Secretary to the President of the United States, appeared below the bar and announced that he was directed by the President to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The President's annual message was delivered to the Chair, and the Secretary read it and the accompanying proclamation. [The message will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. FOOT. I move that the message and accompanying documents lie on the table, and that the usual number of copies be printed for the use of the Senate. A motion for an extra number will be in order when the Committee on Printing shall have been formed.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF A CHAPLAIN.

Mr. FOOT. The Senate will now proceed, I suppose, to the execution of the order of yesterday, to elect a Chaplain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed to execute the order of yesterday for the election of a Chaplain. Senators will be kind enough to provide themselves with ballots, and the pages will pass the ballot-boxes on each side of the Senate Chamber.

The ballots having been deposited, collected, and canvassed, the result was announced, as follows:

Whole number of votes, 42; necessary to a choice, 22; of which—

Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D., received.....	21
Rev. D. V. McLean, D. D.....	17
Rev. John H. Hopkins, D. D.....	1
Rev. R. A. Arthur.....	1
Rev. P. D. Gurley.....	1
Rev. Thomas P. Durbin, D. D.....	1

And there were four blanks, which were not regarded.

There being no choice, the Senate again proceeded to ballot, with the following result:

Whole number of votes, 40; necessary to a choice, 21; of which—

Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D., received.....	21
Rev. D. V. McLean, D. D.....	16
Rev. L. B. Dennis.....	1
Rev. T. P. Durbin.....	1
Rev. P. D. Gurley.....	1

Mr. SUNDERLAND having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared to be duly elected Chaplain to the Senate for the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

THANKS TO GENERAL GRANT.

During the ballot for Chaplain, a message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant and the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during the rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck to be presented to Major General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is now dividing, and no motion is in order at this time.

When the election of a Chaplain was consummated—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I made a motion to take up and concur with the resolution just presented from the House of Representatives; but it is more in accordance with the proceedings in the Senate that all matters of this kind should go to a committee. Although I have no doubt whatever that we shall arrive at the same result, I move now, instead of concurring in the resolution, that it lie on the table until the Committee on Military Affairs shall have been appointed, and I shall then move its reference to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution from the House of Representatives will have its first reading.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant and the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during this rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck to be presented to Major General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America, was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not bury the resolution. The whole country knows, without its being repeated, what General Grant has done; the history of his transactions is before the world; and I presume every Senator is ready, without investigation, to vote for the resolution. I think it would be much more appropriate to pass it at once as it has come from the House of Representatives, and unanimously; and I hope we may have the unanimous consent of the Senate—that, of course, is the only way in which it can be done—to its consideration and passage now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the further consideration of this resolution at the present time?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. FESSENDEN rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine rise to object?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I rise to make a remark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The whole thing is out of order unless the subject is before the Senate; and it is not before the Senate unless they consent to consider it. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Maine took the floor, and of course, while he had the floor, nobody else had a right to rise. The Chair now says nobody has risen to object. Nobody had a right to rise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine was not recognized for the purpose of addressing the Senate. The Chair inquired if he rose to address the Senate; but if another Senator had risen to interpose an objection, the Chair would have recognized in that Senator a preliminary right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the President had allowed me to be heard, he would have perceived that I rose for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to make a remark in the present stage of proceedings before the resolution was taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will proceed, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say that I intended to object, but I rose to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a single remark in response to what was said by the Senator from Illinois, and, if there is no objection, I suppose I can do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection; the Senator will proceed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What I wished to say was this: I presume there is no Senator who is not perfectly ready to vote for this resolution. I am, for one. I acknowledge and feel the services of General Grant and his army as sensibly as any man present, and I certainly shall not put myself in the attitude of interposing a single objection to the present consideration of the resolution, because that would be invidious; but I rose simply for the purpose of saying that in my judgment it will be quite as acceptable to General Grant and that army to have the regular course of proceeding taken, the resolution referred to and reported back from the committee with the unanimous recommendation that it pass, and then a unanimous vote upon it, as to take it now on the instant, on the ground that nobody will object to it. The reason why, in my judgment, that would be quite as complimentary and better, is this: although we may have no doubt about it in this particular case, there may be other cases in which we may doubt. It will be quite as complimentary, I say, and we shall thus gain. How gain? By not setting a bad precedent, and not having it said to us hereafter with reference to these matters, "You did it in the case of General Grant; why withhold it now?" and having everything go contrary to the rule and order of a dignified body which has recognized modes of doing business. I cannot conceive of anything that is to be gained by breaking over the ordinary and customary rule, while I can see that much may be lost by exposing ourselves to the precedent that we shall have thus established in the beginning of the session. I am opposed to it on principle, because I have seen the evil effects, time and again, of our acting like a town meeting, thinking because there is no dispute on a particular subject we must therefore push it at the instant. Still, sir, I shall not put myself in the position of objecting to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume that the Senator from Maine, as well as myself, desires to express this compliment in the most gratifying way to General Grant and the brave soldiers under his command. I thought it would be, perhaps, more acceptable to have passed the resolution at once, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, without its reference to a committee. If, however, it will be more agreeable to the feelings of a single Senator, who I know feels, as I do, a great debt of gratitude to General Grant and the brave soldiers he has led, I shall not ask unanimous consent for its consideration to-day. I shall not press that, if the other course is thought more agreeable, for I wish to put no Senator in the position of objecting to a resolution which I know in his heart he is for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly; I am for it with all my heart.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the resolution will lie on the table, for reference at the appropriate time.

USE OF CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. WADE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution, and if there be no objection I shall ask for its present consideration.

Leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 1) allowing the use of the Congressional Library to the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and it was read the first time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let that lie on the table, and go to a committee when the committees shall have been appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It being objected to, the resolution will lie over.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 9, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that, unless there be objection, he will present to the House each morning such executive communications as may be upon the Speaker's table, to be disposed of unless they give rise to debate; in which case they will be withdrawn and taken up in order.

No objection was made.

TREASURER'S ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States for the third and fourth quarters of 1861, and the first and second quarters of 1862; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, of the receipts and expenditures of the Post Office Department for the year 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures of the Post Office Department, and ordered to be printed.

VISIT TO RUSSIAN FLEET.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of State:

[Unofficial.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, December 8, 1863.

SIR: Admiral Lessowski has intimated to me a wish, on his part and that of the other officers of the Russian naval vessels now here, to receive on board of them members of Congress and the ladies of their families. I will consequently thank you to ascertain and let me know when it would be agreeable to members to make the visit.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. POMEROY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the invitation of Admiral Lessowski be accepted, and that Saturday of this week, at noon, be fixed for such reception, and that the Clerk be requested to communicate the action of the House to the Secretary of State.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to make the privileged motion, that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is longer than we can adjourn under the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENS. It has frequently been done. There are only three working days intervening. However, if there is objection made, I will withdraw the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be the consideration of the following resolution, yesterday submitted by Mr. Cox, and laid over for one day under the rules:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully and urgently requested to take immediate steps for the exchange of such of our prisoners as are now confined in the prisons of the South; and that he be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence in the War Department with reference to the exchange of prisoners.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend that resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

That this House approve of the constant and statesmanlike efforts of the Administration to secure the exchange of our prisoners now in the hands of the rebels; and that it is hereby recommended that such efforts be continued to secure the exchange of our prisoners now in southern prisons.

Upon that amendment I ask the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. As this is all unnecessary, I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. COX. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. If there is to be any difficulty about this matter, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. COX. I think I was entitled to the floor upon this resolution when it came up this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was entitled to the floor; but he did not claim it, and the Chair awarded it to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I suggest to my colleague that he modify his substitute by adding after the word "statesmanlike" the word "humane."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will accept that amendment, and now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY addressed the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I raise the question of order that the gentleman having withdrawn his demand for the previous question to introduce his amendment, debate is now in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I do not think there was any renewal of the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that he heard the gentleman from Illinois renew the demand for the previous question, and that settles the question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. LOVEJOY demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—94.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Knibbsch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Stebbins, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOVEJOY demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Lazear, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—106.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chanler, Cox, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Philip Johnson, Knibbsch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—46.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was here received by Mr. NICOLAY, Private Secretary of the President.

The message was taken from the Speaker's table, and read. [It will be published in the Appendix.]

The reading of the message was frequently interrupted by applause.

PRINTING OF THE MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that fifty thousand copies be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion for the printing of fifty thousand extra copies of the message will, under the rules, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion to refer and print the usual number of copies was adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at ten minutes to two o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 10, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SONDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with law, the accounts of the superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern superintendency, for the first and second quarters of the year 1863, of disbursements for certain Indian tribes; and also the accounts of the said superintendent of disbursements for the third quarter of 1863; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition from the president and students of the Meadville (Pennsylvania) Theological School, in which they earnestly pray that Congress will pass, at the earliest practicable day, an act emancipating all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I present the petition of H. Gould Rogers, grandson of Edward Rogers, an officer of the revolutionary Navy, praying compensation for the revolutionary services of his grandfather, and for moneys expended by him during the revolutionary war. I ask that it may lie on the table until the committee appropriate to the subject shall have been announced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a petition from paymasters' clerks, in the several pay districts throughout the United States, and also a petition from certain paymasters on the same subject, respectfully requesting that the act of Congress, approved August 12, 1848, be so amended as to increase the annual pay of paymasters' clerks to $1,400. The petitioners suggest that, in consideration of their duties, expenses, and risks of life, they are entitled to remuneration at least equal to that of clerks in similar positions in the civil departments of the Government. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of Commodore William D. Porter in behalf of himself and the officers and crew of the gunboat Essex, asking for bounty for the destruction of the rebel iron-clad ram Arkansas, under the act of Congress in relation to that subject; and I move that it be laid on the table until the committees shall have been appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. GRIMES gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill entitled an act to encourage enlistments in the naval service of the United States, and to credit such enlistments upon the military quotas of the respective States.

Mr. SUMNER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal all acts of Congress for the rendition of fugitive slaves.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 10, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN DISBURSEMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting accounts of the superintendent and agents of Indians in the southern superintendency, as required by act of Congress, for disbursements made for various Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INVITATION TO VISIT THE RUSSIAN FLEET.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following unofficial letter from the Secretary of State:

Unofficial.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1863.

SIR: The Russian minister has intimated to me that the Admiral will be ready to receive members of Congress and the ladies of their families on Saturday next. Boats will be ready at the navy-yard at twelve o'clock, noon, on that day, to take them on board.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant.

WM. H. SEWARD.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What disposition has been made of the letter?

The SPEAKER. It was only read for the information of the House.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

BILLS UNDER THE RULES.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to give notice of the introduction of a bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the notice of the introduction of bills can be sent, in writing, to the Clerk's desk, and will be entered upon the Journal. Otherwise the Clerk will not be able to know what bills and joint resolutions it is proposed to present. The Chair deems it necessary to make this statement at this time.

States will now be called for resolutions, under which bills on leave may be presented, beginning with the State of Maine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Are bills to be introduced for reference?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. But there are no committees.

Mr. PENDLETON. That does not matter; the committees will be appointed. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. PENDLETON. Let us introduce bills and joint resolutions, for reference.

The House refused to adjourn.

MISSOURI CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. HALL. I rise to a privileged question. I present the memorial of Thomas L. Price, contesting the seat of Hon. Joseph W. McClurg, Representative from the fifth congressional district of Missouri, and move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order of business, which is the call of States for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. LOVEJOY. We have not yet elected a Chaplain for this Congress.

The SPEAKER. If that be urged it will be first in order, as it has been held to be a question of privilege connected with the organization of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now proceed to the election of a Chaplain for the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Nominations are now in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I nominate Rev. Thomas H. Stockton, who was the Chaplain of the last Congress.

Mr. SPAULDING nominated Rev. Frederick T. Brown.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, nominated Rev. Daniel Gans.

Mr. GRINNELL nominated Rev. W. W. Wood, of Iowa.

Mr. ROGERS nominated Rev. N. Pettit, of New Jersey.

Mr. DRIGGS nominated Parson Brownlow, of Tennessee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio, nominated Rev. B. A. Maguire.

Mr. COX nominated Bishop Hopkins, of Vermont.

Mr. STEVENS nominated Rev. Nathan Lord, of New Hampshire.

Mr. WILDER nominated Rev. Mr. Channing, of Washington.

Mr. LOVEJOY nominated Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I nominate Rev. Mr. Channing.

The SPEAKER. He has been nominated already.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I withdraw my nomination, and go with my colleague for Rev. Mr. Channing.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, SPAULDING, GRINNELL, and ROGERS, as tellers.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the Clerk to read the 134th rule.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

"No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, foreign ministers, the Governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, and judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. The notice of the House being called to this matter, the Doorkeeper will see that the rule just read is enforced.

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for Chaplain. Before the result was announced, a large number of members changed their votes, concentrating on the two highest candidates.

The tellers made the following report:

Whole number of votes, 163; necessary to a choice, 82; of which—

Rev. William Henry Channing received	83
Rev. Bishop Hopkins	54
Rev. Thomas H. Stockton	14
Rev. B. A. Maguire	5

For Mr. Maguire—Messrs. Chanler, Finck, Kernan, Long, and John O'Neill.

For Mr. Brownlow—Messrs. Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Driggs, and Whaley.

For Mr. Pettit—Messrs. Ganson and Rogers.

For Mr. Gans—Mr. Griswold.

Rev. WILLIAM HENRY CHANNING, of the District of Columbia, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly elected Chaplain of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the memorial of John P. Bruce, contesting the election of Benjamin Loan, from the seventh congressional district of Missouri. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of States for resolutions, under which bills of which previous notice has been given may be introduced on leave.

Mr. FENTON. I ask for the reading of the 115th rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee, or by motion for leave. In the latter case, at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion in the House, or by filing a memorandum thereof with the Clerk, and having it entered on the Journal; and the motion shall be made, and the bill introduced, if leave is given, when resolutions are called for; such motion, or the bill when introduced, may be committed."

Mr. FENTON. I have accomplished all I desired by the reading of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from Barclay's Digest, page 20, the comment on this rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The notice above referred to is rarely given in the House, (it being in order to give it there only when resolutions are in order,) but is usually given to the Clerk by sending to him a written memorandum in this form: 'Mr. — gives notice that to-morrow or on some subsequent day he will ask leave to introduce a bill; here insert its title.'"

The SPEAKER. Although the 115th rule allows members the alternative of giving notice of bills in the House, or by filing it with the Clerk, really no member has the right to rise and give such notice, without unanimous consent, except when his State is called for resolutions. This morning the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] demanded the regular order of business, which was the call of States for resolutions. When the State of New York was reached, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FENTON] would have been in order in giving his notice, but at the time he proposed to give it was not in order, and could not be indulged in without unanimous consent.

Mr. FENTON. I supposed that, as no objection was made in the House, that consent was given.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made by the gentleman from Indiana demanding the regular order of business twice, which shut out everything but the regular order, except questions of privilege and privileged questions.

Mr. FENTON. I presume that the notice I gave was properly entered, but whether it was or was not, I now move that the House adjourn.

The House divided, and there were—ayes, 78; noes, 68:

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half past one o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 14, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MORGAN (in the temporary absence of Mr. HENDERSON) presented the credentials of Hon. B. GRATZ BROWN, chosen by the Legislature of Missouri a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expulsion of Waldo Porter Johnson, for the term ending March 3, 1867. The credentials were read, the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. Brown, and he took his seat in the Senate.

FINANCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances; which, on motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, was ordered to be printed, and a motion by him to print extra copies was referred to the Committee on Printing.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees of the body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will require the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the Senate, by unanimous consent, dispense with the rule which requires that the committees shall be elected by ballot.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. POWELL. I believe it has been the custom—with a single exception I know it has been since I have had a seat on this floor—for the majority, in forming the committees, to make out a list assigning to their own members the places desired for them, and leaving blanks for the places to be filled by the minority. The list of committees was passed to the minority for the purpose of filling the blanks, and then the election occurred in the mode indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not know whether any gentleman on our side has seen this list of committees or not. I merely wished to inquire of the Senators in the majority if they had exhibited their list to the Senators on this side, in order that we might, in accordance with the custom which has prevailed since I have been here, with the single exception of the last Congress, have an opportunity of designating those whom we wish to be upon the committees on our side.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps if the Senator will allow the list to be read—

Mr. POWELL. I do not ask that the list be read; I merely wish to know if Senators on the other side of the Chamber have conferred with any of the Senators on this side.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not aware of any communication having passed between the majority and minority.

Mr. POWELL. I merely wished to make that inquiry; that was all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the suspension of the rules? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky. I served in a minority in the Senate for a number of years; and I am quite sure that the majority at that time, with whom the Senator from Kentucky now acts—I do not remember that he himself was here—presented no list of committees to the minority to fill up.

Mr. CLARK. It was done once or twice.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was done sometimes, but it was not the uniform practice of the majority of the Senate. I served here for two years without seeing a committee in session. I believe I was placed on some committee, but it never met; and I was placed there not by any action of the minority with whom I acted, and which at that time, I think, constituted fifteen members of the Senate. I merely wish to correct the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, as to its having been the uniform practice, with the exception, perhaps, of the last Congress, to submit a list of committees to the minority of the Senate, leaving blanks for them to fill. Such was not the practice uniformly when the Democrats were in power. They sometimes did so, and sometimes did not.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois desired to correct my statement. My statement was in every particular correct. I did not state what had been the custom before I entered this body. My statement was, that since I had been a member of the Senate, the Democratic party, each session, sent to the opposition a list of committees, leaving blanks for their party, and they filled them. What the custom had been anterior to that time I did not state, for I knew nothing about it. That was the courtesy extended to Senators on that side when I served in this Chamber with the majority; and I think as a matter of courtesy it was proper in itself. I think the majority ought, on all occasions, to extend that courtesy to the minority. I was pleased that the party to which I belonged, when in the majority, thus acted. I thought it right; and I think now it would be a matter of courtesy, and it would be eminently proper on the part of the majority, to allow the minority to place their members on such committees as they chose. Let the majority make out their committees, leaving blanks for the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, and let this side fill up and pass back the list.

Mr. HALE. May I be allowed a word, sir? I do not know what the question is; but I think if there be a member here who has a right to speak of the experiences of being in a minority on this floor, I am that man. I have been here for many years; and I think it is within a very short period that ever I or anybody with whom I ever acted was consulted in regard to the formation of the committees. I remember, on one occasion—I think, sir, you will remember the same—a list of committees was reported here, got up I do not know how, and I was omitted altogether from any committee, and so was my excellent friend on my left, [Mr. SUMNER,] and so was the distinguished gentleman who now stands at the head of the Treasury of the United States. We were omitted altogether; and on instituting some little inquiry of the Democratic oligarchy that ruled the Senate as to why it was done, we were politely informed that we did not belong to a healthy political organization, and therefore we had been left off the committees entirely. But, sir, finally my health got so, politically, that this same party did put me at the tail end of the Committee on Private Land Claims, [laughter,] where I served without remonstrance or reproach. I could not render much service. A good many of those claims were found to rest in old Spanish grants; and, not being entirely conversant with the language, I had to trust to other agencies to find out what was intended. But I want to say, sir, that a claim to anything of this sort comes with an ill grace from a party who thus ruled the Senate when they had power. In this connection, too, permit me to say, that in the long period of my service here, I have never asked of my friends or enemies any place on any committee at any time. I have always served as well as I knew how on committees, and when I was off I served off as well as I knew how, without any rebuke or reproach to anybody. If it is practicable to let the gentlemen who now constitute the minority be consulted, I should be perfectly willing to agree to it; and I suppose if they raise the objection, they have a right to do so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand the honorable Senator from Kentucky as objecting to the proposed mode of proceeding, but rather as making an inquiry. It is the fact that at different times different modes have been adopted with reference to this matter. When I first came into the Senate, very little attention was paid in any way to the gentlemen, to use the honorable Senator's expression, "on this side of the Chamber;" that is to say, to the few gentlemen who were in the minority at that time. Afterwards, when a party they became quite large and strong, places were left upon the committees for them. The reason given, as I understood it, was that there were so few of them that it was as well for the majority to make up the committees, instead of expending a great deal of time in choosing them. That course was adopted at the last Congress, for the reason that there were very few gentlemen in the Senate—an exceedingly small number—who in any way placed themselves in opposition to the course the Government had taken; consequently the committees were made up by the majority; and I think the honorable Senator himself said to me that they were very fairly and liberally made up. I understood him to say so; and certainly, if I did not hear it from him, I heard the remark from a late Senator from Indiana, at any rate, who was placed on some of the committees.

Our difficulty in relation to this matter is simply this, that it is hard for us to understand what is meant by gentlemen on that side of the Chamber. Most of the Senators on that side act with the majority, and claim so to act. It left, therefore, only a very small number who were supposed in any degree to be in opposition; and instead of leaving particular places to be filled up, it was thought best to appoint the committees in this way. It never was the custom to leave places for the minority on all the committees; but on just such committees as the majority chose. Instead of leaving a small number of places on various committees to be filled up, it was thought best, as the gentlemen are very well known, to fill them up; and I believe it has been done in this list with such a degree of liberality, or rather of justice extended to all gentlemen, that there can be no complaint about it. I think the Senator will find it to be so when he comes to hear the list read.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Maine is certainly correct as to the fact that I only made a statement by way of inquiry. I made no objection, and do not intend to make any, to the mode of appointment of the committees. The mode, though, in which the committees seem to have been appointed since the Democrats have been out of power here, differs from the mode in which they were appointed while I served in this body when we were in the majority. I merely made an inquiry. Some Senators, the Senator from New Hampshire and others, have indicated by their remarks that this was asking a favor. Sir, I never intended for a moment to ask any favor in the matter of committees or anything else from gentlemen on that side of the Chamber. All we have a right to hope for is simple justice, if we can get that. I merely suggested that I thought, in courtesy, it would be eminently proper for the majority to make up the committees in the manner in which they have been usually heretofore made. That is all I wish to say on the subject. I am indifferent personally about the matter. I really had no objection to the committees on which I was placed at the last session, and I presume I shall have none this time. Even if they leave me off entirely, I assure the Senate I shall not complain. I certainly shall not ask to be put on any committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection is made to suspending the rule, as proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following nominations, and I think the Senator from Kentucky and his friends on the other side of the Chamber will find that they are treated in this list with great liberality.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The list will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

On Foreign Relations—Messrs. Sumner, (chairman,) Foster, Doolittle, Harris, Davis, Johnson, and McDougall.
On Finance—Messrs. Fessenden, (chairman,) Sherman, Howe, Cowan, Clark, Van Winkle, and Conness.
On Commerce—Messrs. Chandler, (chairman,) Morrill, Ten Eyck, Morgan, Sprague, Bowden, and Saulsbury.

On Naval Affairs—Messrs. Hale, (chairman,) Grimes, Anthony, Willey, Ramsey, Harding, and Hicks.
On the Judiciary—Messrs. Trumbull, (chairman,) Foster, Ten Eyck, Harris, Howard, Bayard, and Powell.
On the Post Office and Post Roads—Messrs. Collamer, (chairman,) Dixon, Ramsey, Henderson, Bowden, Conness, and Buckalew.
On Public Lands—Messrs. Harlan, (chairman,) Pomeroy, Foot, Harding, Carlile, Hendricks, and Wright.
On Private Land Claims—Messrs. Harris, (chairman,) Sumner, Howard, Bayard, and McDougall.
On Indian Affairs—Messrs. Doolittle, (chairman,) Wilkinson, Lane of Kansas, Harlan, Nesmith, Brown, and Buckalew.
On Pensions—Messrs. Foster, (chairman,) Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Bowden, Van Winkle, Saulsbury, and Buckalew.
On Revolutionary Claims—Messrs. Wilkinson, (chairman,) Chandler, Wilson, Nesmith, and Wright.
On Claims—Messrs. Clark, (chairman,) Howe, Pomeroy, Anthony, Morrill, Hicks, and Hendricks.
On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Grimes, (chairman,) Dixon, Morrill, Wade, Willey, Henderson, and Richardson.
On Patents and the Patent Office—Messrs. Cowan, (chairman,) Ten Eyck, Sherman, Ramsey, and Saulsbury.
On Public Buildings and Grounds—Messrs. Foot, (chairman,) Trumbull, Grimes, Henderson, and Hendricks.
On Territories—Messrs. Wade, (chairman,) Wilkinson, Hale, Lane of Kansas, Carlile, Davis, and Richardson.
To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—Messrs. Dixon, (chairman,) Clark, and Harding.
On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Lane of Indiana, (chairman,) Sumner, and Willey.
On Printing—Messrs. Anthony, (chairman,) Morgan, and Powell.
On Enrolled Bills—Messrs. Howe, (chairman,) Cowan, and Hicks.
On the Library—Messrs. Collamer, (chairman,) Fessenden, and Johnson.

The question being put, the list, as read, was adopted.

REFERENCE OF MEMORIALS AND BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection on the part of the Senate, the several memorials which have been presented by Senators will be taken from the files and referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. HALE. And bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Bills and joint resolutions which have had their first and second readings will also be included in the reference.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of seamen in the United States revenue cutter service, attached to the cutter Caleb Cushing, praying for remuneration for loss of property sustained by them in the destruction by the rebels of that vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. S. Merrill, praying for the passage of an act to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle his accounts as quartermaster and commissary of the fifth regiment of Maine volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of George Henry Preble, commander in the United States Navy, praying for relief from what he considers the unjust decision of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in refusing to allow his account as commander afloat from the 16th of July to the 12th of October, 1862, and as commander "waiting orders" from October, 1862, to the date of his present commission as commander; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILKINSON presented the memorial of A. J. Campbell, praying for relief under the second article of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, made June 19, 1858; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Richard G. Murphy, late agent for the Sioux Indians, praying relief for certain vouchers erroneously given; which, with the papers already on file, were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Dr. F. G. Hunt, and other inhabitants of Brookline, Massachusetts, praying for the passage of a law providing for a uniform ambulance and hospital system for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Jane B. Carver, widow of the Rev. Robert Carver, of Taunton, Massachusetts, chaplain of the seventh regiment of Massachusetts volunteers, who died of disease contracted in the service of the country. The petitioner represents that on application for a pension she was informed that no provision was made for the widows and families of chaplains, according to the existing laws, and she therefore prays that a pension be granted her, the same as is granted to widows of officers of like rank in the Army. The petition was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of Franklin Eliot Felton, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, suggesting several propositions of amendment to the existing patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. NESMITH presented a petition of citizens of Portland, Oregon, praying that Portland may be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of assistant assessors under the excise laws of the United States for the State of Connecticut, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Susan W. Dunmore, widow of Rev. George W. Dunmore, chaplain to the first regiment Wisconsin cavalry, who, while discharging the duties of that office, was detailed upon guard duty by the colonel of the regiment, and was killed in a skirmish with the enemy at La Anguille Ferry, on the 3d of August, 1862. The petitioner prays that a suitable pension may be granted to her. The petition was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POMEROY. I present the memorial of Berendt A. Froiseth, praying for the enactment of suitable laws for the encouragement and protection of foreign immigrants arriving within the jurisdiction of the United States, which would render more effective the national homestead act of May 20, 1862. The memorial is of considerable interest, and I ask that it may be printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and the motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts in favor of an increase of pay of the soldiers in the service of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts in favor of the men of Massachusetts who are now in the naval service being counted as part of her military contingent; also, that the non-commissioned officers and privates of the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments of Massachusetts volunteers are entitled to and should receive from the national Government the same pay and allowances as other troops; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in relation to the compensation of the inspectors of customs for the port of New York be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That the papers in relation to the claim of John Egenoff be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRINTING OF MESSAGE AND DOCUMENTS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the propriety of printing the message of the President and the reports of the heads of Departments, without the accompanying documents, and what number, if any, should be printed for the use of the Senate; also, to report what, if any, additional number should be printed with a part of the accompanying documents.

NAVY REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be authorized to print, in addition to the number now authorized by law, fifteen hundred copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and appendix, for the use of the vessels of the Navy, and five hundred copies of the report proper for the office of the Secretary of the Navy.

LIBRARY OF THE SENATE.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolutions; which, with a communication on the subject from the Chief Clerk of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That one copy of each of the books and sets of books, maps, charts, atlases, and printed bound documents, in the possession of the Senate, be collected together by the Secretary from the various rooms and apartments set apart for the use of the Senate, so as to form one complete set or copy of each and all of the same, which shall be properly arranged in classes and sections, and which, together with such other books and matters as may from time to time be directed to be procured by the Committee on the Library of the Senate for that purpose, shall be formed into a Library of the Senate, for the special use of its members and committees and the business of the Senate and Secretary's office, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Committee on the Library of the Senate, for the time being, which regulations shall be printed and furnished to the members, committees, and officers of the Senate at the commencement of each session, and shall be observed and conformed to by them, until modified or changed by the committee or by the order of the Senate.

Resolved, That a librarian shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Senate to take charge of the said library, whose duty it shall be to keep a complete and faithful record of every book, map, atlas, and article received or placed in such library, and diligently to make himself acquainted with the same, so as to be able, whenever called upon by a member, or on the part of a committee of the Senate, or the office of the Secretary, to furnish any such book or other article for use in the library, or any information in tabular or other form that may be required from them, and to take a particular account of every book or other article delivered out of the library to any member, or committee, or the Secretary, and to require its return into the library according to the regulations prescribed by the said Committee on the Library, or the Senate, and also to perform such other duties in the said library as may be prescribed by the said committee, the Senate, or the Secretary of the Senate; and the compensation of the said librarian shall be $2,000 per annum, with the same official qualification under oath, and subject to the same penalties for neglect or violation of the rules, as are the other officers of the Senate.

Resolved, That the arrangement made for the occupation of the rooms of the north extension of the Capitol, set apart for the Senate by the resolution of the 18th of January, 1858, be so far changed that the rooms numbered 99, 100, and 101, shall be appropriated for this library, and the rooms numbered 87, 89, and 111, shall be appropriated for the use of select committees, and such other committees not already occupying separate rooms as may be assigned to them by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, for the time being, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WILKINSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution relative to a certain grant of land for railroad purposes in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. DIXON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, in such manner as to exempt clergymen of all religious denominations from the operation of said act.

Mr. NESMITH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for the establishment of a branch mint of the United States at Portland, Oregon.

Mr. HENDRICKS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to extend the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grant of lands for the benefit of agricultural colleges made by the act of July 2, 1862.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 3) more effectually to suppress the rebellion; which was read a first time by its title.

Mr. HALE. As the bill is very short, and it is important, I wish that it may be read at length on its second reading.

The Secretary read it a second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter all persons within the United States of America are equal before the law; and all claims to personal service, except those founded on contract and the claim of a parent to the service of a minor child, and service rendered in pursuance of sentence for the punishment of crime, be and the same are hereby forever abolished, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HALE. Let it lie on the table for the present. I should like to have it printed. I shall call it up at some future time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table, and the order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILKINSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 4) to extend the act of Congress granting pensions, to persons wounded in the Indian massacres in Minnesota in the years 1862 and 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 5) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 6) to increase the pay of the rank and file of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 7) to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following joint resolutions; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia:

A joint resolution (S. No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks, and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 3) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker and Major General George G. Meade, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac.

Mr. GRIMES, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 8) to encourage enlistments into the naval service of the United States, and to credit enlisted men to the military quotas of the States of which they may be citizens; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate duplicate copies of the laws of Dakota Territory for 1862-1863; of the laws of Nevada Territory for 1862; and of the laws of the Territory of Utah for the year 1862-1863; one copy of each of which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and the others ordered to be placed upon the files of the Senate.

REFERENCE OF THE MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as refers to our foreign relations be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message and the accompanying documents as relates to the Navy and naval affairs, and the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 14, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING; as follows:

Being of beings, Spirit of spirits, Life of life, God and Father of angels and men, our God and Father: We are Thy creatures, we would adore Thee. We are Thy subjects, we would obey Thee. We are Thy children, we would love Thee. Oh, make the influences of Thy Spirit and of Thy providential power felt in this assembly of statesmen, to whom Thou hast, in so large a measure, intrusted the destinies of this Republic in this awful crisis of its fate. Enlighten their consciences, we pray Thee, our Father; with wisdom from on high, to see and choose a policy fitted to restore liberty and union, one and inseparable, throughout the bounds of this re-integrated Republic. Give, we pray Thee, that disinterestedness of purpose and devotedness to Thee, that true patriotism, which shall make them the instruments of Thy good pleasure to redeem their native land.

Be with the head of this Republic; be with all the officers of his Cabinet, severally and unitedly. Endow them with a sagacity worthy of a Christian commonwealth; give them that rectitude of will to serve their nation through all sacrifices and at any cost, that may make them the brain and heart of this nation, vitalizing it throughout.

Be, we pray Thee, with our armies, our soldiers and leaders in the field. Give to the leaders sagacity, promptitude, energy, indomitable courage, and a will to serve Thee and their fellow-men. Give to our soldiers heroism, fortitude, indomitable purpose, God willing, to be the servants of this redeemed Republic.

Be, O our Father, with those who are stretched in hospitals, who are suffering for the toils, suffering with wounds they have borne for the restoration of the freedom of this Republic; solace their sorrows; raise them up to health; restore them once more to their true places in society in the midst of their fellow-citizens. And be with the widows and orphans in many homes; God of consolation, give them Thy comfort, and lift upon them the light of eternal life.

Be, O our Father, with our prisoners, our brethren in captivity, in this hour; give them, we pray Thee, the hope of redemption and restoration; give them mutual disinterestedness and mutual service. Touch the hearts of the brutal tyrants who hold them in captivity, with honor, with humanity, and with some sense of their obligation to the common conscience of Christendom.

Be, we pray Thee, with the oppressed and the enslaved, to ransom them and lead them out of their house of bondage. Be with the freedmen, to raise them to be fellow-citizens with us in the high privileges of this Republic.

Finally, be with our enemies; crush and humble tyrants in the dust, and disenthral a people maddened by partisan passions. Father, we pray Thee, by Thine influences, to restore them in loyal service once more to this Republic.

And now, with a spirit of universal equity, give us universal freedom. May Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done. We ask it for and in the name and as the disciples of Thy beloved Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we ascribe praise and glory to Thee forever. Amen.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

OATH OF CHAPLAIN.

Rev. W. H. CHANNING, Chaplain of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Eighth Congress, came forward and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

The SPEAKER stated that the committee on rules would be announced to-morrow.

BILLS ON LEAVE.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of States for bills on leave, and joint resolutions, commencing with the State of Maine.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of June 5, A. D. 1854; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MORRILL. I move its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WARD. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to allow that joint resolution to go to the Committee on Commerce. It is well known to members of the old House that this subject was very fully and very elaborately considered in the Committee on Commerce last session; and it would seem much more appropriate to permit the subject to remain there than to send it now to the Committee of Ways and Means. The honorable gentleman will have an opportunity to discuss the question when it comes up.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, this question has been hitherto considered rather as a foreign than as a domestic question. It is really a question of a domestic character, relating to the revenues, and I therefore desire its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. By the existence of the present commercial treaty with Great Britain we are deprived of the privilege of revising our tariff or of levying an internal tax according as our own wisdom and judgment may dictate. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and on that question I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. After the gentleman from Vermont has had his say I hope he will give me a moment.

The SPEAKER. By the rules of the House debate is not allowed during the morning hour. All bills introduced must be referred without debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I was aware of that; but as the gentleman from Vermont has taken occasion to state the reasons why this matter should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, I wish to show why it should rather go to the Committee on Commerce.

Objection was made.

Mr. WARD. I move to amend by referring to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order after the previous question being called.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MORRILL. Is it in order to withdraw the joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not, it having been read a first and second time.

Mr. WARD. I now move to amend, by referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to.

BUREAU OF EMANCIPATION.

Mr. ELIOT introduced a bill to establish a Bureau of Emancipation; which was read a first and second time, referred to a select committee of five, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTIONS IN TENNESSEE AND LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill to provide for the election of Representatives in Congress from the States of Tennessee and Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

COMMUTATION LAW.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, instructing Senators and requesting Representatives to obtain a modification of the conscription act, so as that towns and subdivisions of enrollment districts shall be credited with their respective quotas; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NEW RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. WARD introduced a bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners to negotiate a new treaty with the British provinces of North America, based upon the true principles of reciprocity; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

STATEMENT OF FINANCES.

Mr. WARD also introduced a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish a semi-monthly statement of the financial condition of the Government during each session of Congress; and monthly during the recess; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHARLES M. POTT.

Mr. ANCONA introduced a bill granting a pension to Charles M. Pott; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MAJOR WILLIAM S. HENRY.

Mr. ANCONA also introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs at law of Major William S. Henry; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

LOSSES ON THE MONITOR.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, introduced a joint resolution to compensate the crew of the United States steamer Monitor for clothing and property destroyed in the public service; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PEOPLE'S PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS introduced a bill granting public lands to the People's Pacific Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast by the northern route; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill I have just introduced be referred to a special committee.

The SPEAKER. That will be done, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Of how many shall the committee consist?

Mr. STEVENS. Of thirteen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether I am at liberty to introduce more than one bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can introduce as many as he desires.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. STEVENS also introduced a bill to fix the pay of colored officers, soldiers, chaplains, and musicians; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPEAL OF CONFISCATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEVENS also introduced a bill to repeal joint resolution No. 63, approved July 17, 1862; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COX. Read it.

The bill was read through. It provides for the repeal of the joint resolution (No. 63) explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862. The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE ACT.

Mr. STEVENS also introduced a bill to repeal the fugitive slave act approved February 12, 1793, and the act amendatory thereto, approved September 18, 1850; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ELECTIONS OF REPRESENTATIVES, ETC.

Mr. STEVENS also introduced a bill to fix the time for holding elections for Representatives in Congress, and to enable soldiers in the service of the United States to vote for said officers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. COX. I have a resolution which I desire to offer for adoption.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SPAULDING introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. Are not the bills which have been introduced ordered to be printed without a motion?

The SPEAKER. They are not.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, that the bills which I have presented be ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It has never been the practice of the House to order the printing of bills when introduced for reference.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose not, and therefore withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. Bills and joint resolutions are ordered to be printed when they are reported from the committees.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. ASHLEY introduced a bill to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENT OF CONFISCATION ACT.

Mr. ASHLEY also introduced a bill to amend the confiscation act, and for other purposes. It was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE ACT.

Mr. ASHLEY also introduced a bill to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ASHLEY also introduced a bill to provide for the submission to the several States of a proposition to amend the national Constitution prohibiting slavery, or involuntary servitude, in all of the States and Territories now owned or which may be hereafter acquired by the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill in extenso.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the second reading of that bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order under the rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe, if objection be made, the question comes up on the second reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule, from page 32 of Barclay's Digest.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"And the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the 117th rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"The first reading of a bill shall be for information, and if opposition be made to it, the question shall be, 'Shall this bill be rejected?' If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Indiana that the 117th rule applies to bills presented in a condition to be passed. Of course, in such a case the gentleman would have a right to object to the second reading, and the bill might be rejected on its first reading. Subsequently, however, to the adoption of that rule—which was adopted at the foundation of the Government in 1789—this rule which has been read was adopted, that on alternate Mondays an hour should be devoted to the consideration of bills for reference only, and the language of that rule is that the bills shall be referred without debate.

The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. ASHLEY, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

TERRITORY OF MONTANA.

Mr. ASHLEY also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

ENLISTMENT OF COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. ASHLEY also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a joint resolution to authorize the enlistment of colored citizens in the rebellious districts; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to have that joint resolution read and put upon its passage.

Mr. COX. I object to that.

Mr. ASHLEY. Then I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and printed.

Mr. COX. I ask that the joint resolution be reported.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble recites that the President of the United States, by his proclamation of October 17, 1863, has called upon the several States to furnish their quota of three hundred thousand additional troops on or before the 5th of January, 1864, notifying them that unless their quotas shall be then full, the remainder will be supplied by draft; and that there are probably five hundred thousand colored citizens within the military lines subject to military duty by the laws of the United States, and residing in districts of country declared to be in rebellion against the national Government.

The joint resolution provides that the officers duly empowered by the President in the States called upon to furnish their quotas be authorized to enlist such able-bodied colored citizens, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, as they can induce by State bounties, or otherwise, to volunteer in the military service of the United States, which colored troops shall be accepted in accordance with the rules and regulations of the War Department; and that the persons so entering the service from districts of country in rebellion shall be credited to the respective quotas of the States procuring their enlistment.

The resolution further provides that the troops so enlisted, and all other colored troops who have been or may hereafter be mustered into the service of the United States, shall receive the same monthly pay, rations, &c., as soldiers in like arms of the service of the United States, and it repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. ECKLEY gave notice of a bill to allow a pension to Christian Winger, who was wounded while in the service of the United States, called into the service by the State of Ohio.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. YEAMAN introduced a bill to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved February 24, 1855, and to amend subsequent acts concerning said court; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. YEAMAN also introduced a joint resolution concerning the restoration of the civil authority of certain States and of the United States within regions once under the control of the existing rebellion; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST ROADS.

Mr. MALLORY, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

ADJOURNMENT FOR HOLIDAYS.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer the following resolution as a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. No privileged question can intervene during the morning hour.

Mr. MALLORY. Is there any time when a privileged question can be acted on?

The SPEAKER. After the morning hour it will be in order.

Several MEMBERS. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Friday next, 18th December, it adjourn to meet on the second Monday of January, 1864.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That resolution cannot certainly be in order at this time.

Mr. MALLORY. I understand that it was held during the last Congress that a motion to adjourn was always in order as a privileged question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe it was held that no motion was in order during the call of States for bills on leave.

The SPEAKER. The object of the rule would be entirely defeated if privileged questions were to be entertained during the morning hour. Therefore the Speaker of last Congress decided, and the House concurred in the decision, that every other business was excluded during the call of States; but after the morning hour it will be in order.

MILITARY EXEMPTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced a bill to repeal so much of the thirteenth section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, as authorizes exemption from military service by the payment of $300, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEARBORN AND HAMILTON COUNTIES.

Mr. HOLMAN also introduced a bill for the relief of the county of Dearborn, Indiana, and the county of Hamilton, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. JULIAN introduced a bill to repeal the third and fourth sections of the act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters, approved February 12, 1793, and the act to amend and supplementary to the aforesaid act, approved September 18, 1850; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RIGHTS OF COLORED MEN.

Mr. LOVEJOY introduced a bill to give effect to the Declaration of Independence, and also to certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the reading of the bill.

The bill was read. It recites that all men were created equal, and were endowed by the Creator with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the fruits of honest toil; that the Government of the United States was instituted to secure those rights; that the Constitution declares that no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law, and also provides—article 5, clause 2—that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in each State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding;" that it is now demonstrated by the rebellion that slavery is absolutely incompatible with the union, peace, and general welfare, for which Congress is to provide. It therefore enacts that all persons heretofore held in slavery in any of the States or Territories of the United States are declared freed men, and are forever released from slavery or involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, on due conviction. The second section enacts that all persons declared free by the first section shall be protected, as all other free citizens are protected, from unreasonable search and seizure, and shall be allowed to sue and be sued, and to testify in cases in the courts of the United States. The third section enacts that if any person shall hereafter seize or arrest, or cause to be seized or arrested and imprisoned, any slave declared free by the act, with intent to reduce such slave to involuntary servitude or bondage, every person so offending shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be subject to indictment and trial in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one year or more than five years, and by fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $5,000.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Chair entertain a motion to lay that bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. It can be made when the bill is reported back.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am informed that there is to be a special committee—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then let the bill go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

PROTECTION OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. LOVEJOY also introduced a bill to protect freedmen, and to punish any one for enslaving them.

Mr. HARDING called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in full.

It was then read a second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMUTATION LAW.

Mr. ARNOLD introduced a bill to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," as authorizes the discharge of a person drafted, on payment of $300; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROCLAMATION OF EMANCIPATION.

Mr. ARNOLD also introduced a bill to aid the President of the United States to carry into immediate execution the proclamation of emancipation of January 1, 1863, and prohibiting the holding of certain persons as slaves in all that portion of the United States designated therein.

Mr. HARDING called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to aid the President of the United States in carrying into more immediate execution the proclamation of emancipation issued by him on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1863, prohibiting the holding of certain persons as slaves in all that portion of the United States designated therein.

Whereas the President of the United States, by his proclamation issued on the 1st day of January, in the year 1863, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army thereof, did, as a fit and lawful means of suppressing the rebellion, in accordance with the laws of war and with the dictates of justice and humanity, order, proclaim, and declare that all persons held as slaves within the limits of certain States and parts of States therein designated were, and should thereafter and forever be, free; and that the executive, military, and naval authorities would and should therefore recognize and maintain the freedom of all such persons; and whereas by said proclamation and order the President has guaranteed to all such persons their freedom, and has pledged the faith and honor of the country that their freedom shall be recognized and forever maintained; and whereas it is the right and the duty of Congress to make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers, whether civil or military, vested by the Constitution in the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; and among such military powers is that of making and executing the proclamation aforesaid; and whereas all persons heretofore held as slaves, as aforesaid, within said designated States or parts of States are now of right free, and ought to be hereafter forever unmolested in the enjoyment of that freedom which the Government of the United States is bound to "recognize and maintain;"

Now, therefore, for the purpose of carrying into more complete and immediate execution the aforesaid proclamation, and to secure forever the recognition and maintenance of the freedom of all persons designated therein, and thereby to provide more effectually for the suppression of the rebellion, the securing of domestic tranquility, the maintaining of the common defense, and the preservation of the liberties of the people;

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all States and parts of States designated in said proclamation as in rebellion, the re-enslaving or holding, or attempting to hold, in slavery or in involuntary servitude of any person who shall have been made or declared to be free by said proclamation, or any of their descendants, from and after the date of said proclamation, otherwise than in punishment of crime whereof the accused shall have been duly convicted, is and shall be forever prohibited, any law or regulation of either of such States to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ILLINOIS LEGISLATION.

Mr. ARNOLD also introduced a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army.

Mr. COX asked that the bill be read.

The bill was read. It revives the grade of lieutenant general of the United States Army, and gives the President the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to confer it, during war, upon the officer of the regular or volunteer forces, of a rank not below that of major general, most distinguished by courage, skill, and genius, in his profession. It also extends to the officer so selected the pay and emoluments provided for that grade by acts heretofore passed.

The joint resolution was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MICHIGAN LAND GRANT.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, introduced a joint resolution extending a grant of public lands from the city of Grand Rapids to the southern line of the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PROHIBITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. WILSON introduced a joint resolution submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. F. WOOD called for the reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read. It provides for submitting, in the usual form, to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States:

Sec. 1. Slavery, being incompatible with a free government, is forever prohibited in the United States; and involuntary servitude shall be permitted only as a punishment for crime.

Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce the foregoing section of this article by appropriate legislation.

The joint resolution was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THIRTY-SEVENTH IOWA.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill for the relief of the members of the thirty-seventh Iowa volunteer infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROBERT STEVENSON.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill for the relief of Robert Stevenson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BOUNTIES TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill to provide for the payment of bounties to soldiers in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POST OFFICE CODE.

Mr. KASSON introduced a bill to revise and codify the laws relating to the Post Office Department; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PORTLAND NAVAL DEPOT.

Mr. SWEAT introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of competent officers to survey the harbor of Portland, Maine, and its surroundings, in reference to its fitness for a naval depot; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

On motion of Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, the select committee this morning ordered to be raised on the subject of a Bureau of Emancipation was directed to consist of nine members instead of five.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES presented the memorial of John H. McHenry, contesting the seat of George H. Yeaman as a member of this House; which, with all papers on file relating to contested elections in the present House, was referred to the Committee on Elections.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER stated the business next in order to be the call of the States and Territories for resolutions.

PRINTING OF TREASURY REPORTS.

Mr. HOOPER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand five hundred copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents; two thousand five hundred of the report, without the accompanying documents; two hundred and fifty copies of the estimates of appropriations; and one hundred and fifty copies of receipts and expenditures, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DEMING submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the members of the House, the regular number of copies of the work prepared by the Librarian, entitled "Dictionary of the United States Congress," and that the Clerk of the House shall pay a suitable copyright, provided that the same shall not exceed $2 50 per copy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. It will then lie over under the rule.

IMMIGRANT BUREAU.

Mr. WARD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be, and is hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing an Immigrant Bureau, in connection with the Department of the Interior, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

PEACE.

Mr. F. WOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read by the Clerk:

Whereas the President, in his message delivered to this House on the 9th instant, and in his recommendation to the people to assemble at their places of worship and give thanks to God for recent victories, claims that the Union cause has gained important and substantial advantages; and whereas, in view of these triumphs, it is no longer beneath our dignity, nor dangerous to our safety, to evince a generous magnanimity becoming a great and powerful people by offering to the insurgents an opportunity to return to the Union without imposing on them degrading or destructive conditions: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to appoint three commissioners, who shall be empowered to open negotiations with the authorities at Richmond, to the end that this bloody, destructive, and inhuman war shall cease, and the Union be restored on terms of equity, fraternity, and equality under the Constitution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. F. WOOD. I have the floor. Is discussion now in order on that resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. F. WOOD. I ask for its adoption; and on that call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Speaker, I have a word to say.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is it in order to raise a point on the reception of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I think that it is an outrage. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. F. WOOD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest debate on both sides of the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alay, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hilly, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Samuel F. Miller, Moorehead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perlman, Pike, Pomroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Spaulding, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Epton, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—98.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldon, English, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—59.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

During the vote—

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that his colleague, Mr. LITTLEJOHN, was detained in his room by sickness.

Mr. FRANK, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. HOLMAN gave notice that he would hereafter object to all such requests. Either the rule must be repealed or enforced.

Mr. VOORHEES objected.

Mr. MOORHEAD stated that his colleague, Mr. KELLEY, was detained at home by illness in his family.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

COURTS IN NORTHERN NEW YORK.

Mr. GANSON introduced a bill to regulate the sessions of the circuit and district courts for the northern district of New York, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the justice and expediency of so amending the enrollment act as to place all persons enrolled under said act in one class, from which class all drafts that are now ordered, or shall hereafter be ordered, shall be made; and that said committee shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

INCREASE OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

Mr. DENNISON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill to increase the pay of all private soldiers now in the service of the United States to thirty dollars per month, and in all cases where a soldier has a family to pay one half of said sum to his family.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the resolution be amended so as to request the committee to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law, I will not object.

Mr. DENNISON. I prefer it as it is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the amendment I have indicated, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment was adopted; there being, on a division—yeas 79, nays 49.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. FINCK. I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, in the opinion of this House, the Federal Government is invested by the Constitution of the United States with all necessary power and authority to suppress any resistance to the due execution of the laws thereof, and to employ the Army and Navy in aid of the civil authority to disperse all armed resistance to the rightful power and jurisdiction of the United States; and whereas, in the judgment of this House, the Army and Navy cannot be rightfully used to subjugate and hold as conquered territory any of the States of this Union: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in this national emergency Congress will forego all feeling of mere passion or resentment, and will recollect only its duty to the country; that this war should not be waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor in any spirit of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of the States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and as soon as these objects are attained the war ought to cease.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then goes over.

REPORT OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

Mr. COX. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report made by Major General George B. McClellan concerning the organization and operations of the army of the Potomac while under his command, and of all Army operations while he was commander-in-chief.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose that resolution lies over for one day, under the rule.

Mr. COX. I have moved the previous question. We treated the gentleman from Illinois very kindly the other day in the case of his favorite general. All we ask in this case is justice.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only ask that the rules of the House shall be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides, according to uniform usage, that the resolution must lie over for one day, inasmuch as it is a resolution asking for information.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to the consideration of the resolution now?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not object. I only ask that the rules be enforced.

Mr. COX. Very well.

SECEDED STATES.

Mr. HARDING. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Union has not been dissolved, and that whenever the rebellion, in any one of the seceded States, shall be put down and subdued, either by force of the Federal arms or by the voluntary submission of the people of such State to the authority of the Constitution, then such State will be thereby restored to all its rights and privileges as a State of the Union, under the constitution of such State and the Constitution of the United States, including the right to regulate, order, and control its own domestic institutions according to the constitution and laws of such State, free from all congressional or executive control or direction.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has demanded the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. If the previous question be not sustained, what will be the condition of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will go over for one day. The House divided on the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 60, noes 88.

So the House refused to second the previous question, and, Mr. STEVENS desiring to debate the resolution, it lies over for one day.

LOSSES OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. GRIDER. I offer the following resolution: Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to report a bill, at their earliest convenience, providing a commission or agency to ascertain and assess the damage done to loyal citizens by the Army of the United States, where no pay has been received, nor sufficient and legal vouchers given the citizen upon which pay can be had and received.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the resolution be so amended as merely to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting such a bill.

The amendment was adopted; and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

STATE RIGHTS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people, and the Federal Executive can neither directly nor indirectly exercise any of the powers thus reserved, or lawfully restrict or obstruct the exercise thereof by the people.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask that that resolution may go over.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to debate it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have demanded the previous question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I ask for tellers on seconding the previous question. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WADSWORTH and BEAMAN were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 83.

So the House refused to second the call for the previous question; and the resolution, giving rise to debate, lies over under the rule.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. VOORHEES offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the increased prices attached to all the commodities of life render the expense of living and of supporting families almost, if not quite, double what sufficed for such purposes at the commencement of the war in which we are now engaged: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to prepare and report, at as early a day as practicable, a bill providing for the increase of the pay of the white private soldiers now or hereafter in the Army of the United States to the sum of twenty-five dollars per month; also providing for the increase of the pay of all commissioned and non-commissioned officers and musicians, now or hereafter in said Army, forty per cent. on the amount now paid them by law; and also providing for the payment to the soldiers who have heretofore been enlisted, including those who have been honorably discharged by reason of disability or other cause, of an amount of bounty money equal to the highest amount now being paid by the Government for volunteers.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to amend his resolution by directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of reporting such a bill. It ought to be so in all these cases. There will then be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept the modification. The resolution was modified accordingly. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

STATES IN INSURRECTION.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following resolution, and on them I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the doctrine recently announced, that the States in which an armed insurrection has existed against the Federal Government have ceased to be States of the Union, and shall be held, on the ultimate defeat of that insurrection, as Territories or subjugated provinces, and governed as such by the absolute will of Congress and the Federal Executive, or restored to the Union on conditions unknown to the Constitution of the United States, ought to be rebuked and condemned as manifestly unjust to the loyal citizens of those States, tending to prolong the war and to confirm the treasonable theory of secession; and, if carried into effect, must greatly endanger the public liberty and the constitutional powers and rights of all the States, by centralizing and consolidating the powers of the Government, State and national, in the Federal Executive.

Resolved, That the only object of the war ought to be to subjugate the armed insurrection which, for the time being, suspends the proper relations of certain States with the Federal Government, and to reestablish the supremacy of the Constitution; and the loyal citizens of those States, and the masses of the people thereof, submitting to the authority of the Constitution, ought not to be hindered from restoring the proper relations of their respective States with the Federal Government, so far as the same is dependent on the voluntary act of the people, by any condition, except unconditional submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States. In the language heretofore solemnly adopted by Congress, the war ought not to be waged on our part for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and as soon as those objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

Resolved, That all necessary and proper appropriations of money ought to be promptly made by this Congress for the support of the military and naval forces of the Government, and all measures of legislation necessary to increase and promote the efficiency of the Army and Navy and to maintain the public credit, ought to be adopted, that, through a vigorous prosecution of the war, peace on the basis of the union of the States and the supremacy of the Constitution may be the more speedily obtained.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. COX. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomerooy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—68.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, Stuart, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—66.

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

LOSSES FROM REBEL RAIDS.

Mr. CRAVENS offered the following resolution; which was read, considered; and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment to loyal citizens for the horses and other property taken from them by the Union or rebel forces during the rebel raid of John H. Morgan into the States of Indiana and Ohio, in July, 1863, and to report at an early day by bill or otherwise.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. JULIAN. I submit the following resolution, and demand the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to refile the third and fourth sections of an act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters, approved February 12, 1793, and the act to amend and supplementary to the aforesaid act, approved September 18, 1850.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay that resolution on the table, and call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he modify his resolution so as to make it one of inquiry, or we shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Debate is not in order, I believe. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denning, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, John S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arriold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pike, Pomerooy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Spaulding, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several committees of this House who were authorized to appoint clerks during the last Congress be authorized to employ them during this Congress, at the usual compensation of four dollars per day while actually employed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to know which committees those are?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the resolution on the table. I am willing, however, to withdraw that motion, if the gentleman from Illinois will give us the information asked for.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am entirely willing to do that, and will withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose. I think the committees which were authorized to employ clerks during the last Congress were the Committee of Elections, the Committee on Commerce, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Territories, and the Committee on Indian Affairs. These, I think, are all the committees that would be embraced in my resolution. The Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee of Claims, and the Committee on Public Lands have clerks permanently employed under special resolutions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then why not name them in the resolution?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well, I will modify the resolution so as to name these committees, and now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I would ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not usually had a clerk?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well; at the request of the gentleman from Ohio, I will include the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois also to include the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That committee has not heretofore, I believe, been allowed a clerk.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I move to amend.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order pending a demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAIRO NAVY-YARD.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his annual message of December 8, 1863, has recommended the establishment of a yard and depot for naval purposes upon one of the western rivers: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of locating such yard and depot for naval purposes at Cairo, Illinois, and to report by bill or otherwise.

PAY OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I offer a resolution which has been made necessary by other action already taken by the House. I submit the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed, in any bill or bills they may report on the subject, to place all regularly enlisted soldiers on the same footing as to pay, without distinction of color.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Speaker, although I prefer the resolution as it now stands, still I am willing to yield to the request of my friends and modify it so that it will instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of doing what is proposed. I therefore make that modification of my resolution.

Mr. COX. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify his resolution; no vote having been taken.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKimney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Goach, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

During the vote—

Mr. ORTH, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question then recurred on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. Is amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not during the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE OF ACCOUNTS.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. The resolution adopted in reference to clerks for committees does not provide for a clerk for the Committee of Accounts, which was authorized to employ a clerk at the last session of Congress. I ask that the omission be supplied, and that that committee be authorized to employ a clerk, like other committees which have been indicated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state that it was by inadvertence that the Committee of Accounts was not included in the resolution. That committee has to adjust the accounts of the House, and needs a clerk perhaps more than any other. I move that it also be authorized to employ a clerk.

The motion was agreed to.

UNEMPLOYED GENERALS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House the names and number of major generals and brigadier generals of volunteers and of the regular Army respectively not on duty, and the length of time which has elapsed since each of them has been relieved from duty, and which of them, and how many, are not now on duty in consequence of wounds or disability incurred in the service.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution if it be so modified as to ask for the amount of pay and allowances unemployed generals are receiving. The resolution goes over, under the rules, if objection be made.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to make that modification.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest another modification: that the resolution shall also ask for the names and number of the staff officers of unemployed generals, and their pay and allowances.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I accept that modification of my resolution.

Mr. COX. By pay and allowances I mean what is received as pay proper and for forage, subsistence, &c., &c., by major generals and brigadier generals who are and have been unemployed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. ARNOLD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the practical workings of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Great Britain; and, if experience has developed defects and inequalities in the operations and working of said treaty, the committee report whether it is not expedient, for the mutual advantage of the parties to said treaty, to alter and amend the same in such manner as to remove such objections, and render the same reciprocally beneficial to both parties thereto.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Friday next, the 18th of December, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 6th of January, 1864.

Mr. SPAULDING. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, no.

Mr. SPAULDING. I withdraw that motion, and call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. The time proposed is too long.

Mr. MALLORY. It is not too long, in my opinion, for members, who wish to go home during the holidays, to do so and return. We can do no business between this and that time. The committees have yet to report, and until they do so we can have no profitable legislation.

Mr. SPAULDING. I object to debate unless we can be heard on this side.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SPAULDING (at ten minutes past three o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MALLORY and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 90, nays 44.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. WILSON demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH (at a quarter past three o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken on Mr. MALLORY's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brooks, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dennison, Dixon, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, English, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jenckes, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, McKimney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perham, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stebbins, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Denning, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Goach, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, William Johnson, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Noble, Norton, Orth, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Smith, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Williams, and Wilson—57.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. ANCONA, (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, of New Jersey, appeared in his seat to-day.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution, that when the House adjourns on Friday next, the 18th of December, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 6th of January, 1864, provided the Senate concur, and asking for the concurrence of the Senate therein.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Mary Ann Watson, widow of Alexander Watson, of the fourth regiment United States artillery, who was killed by the bursting of a cannon on the 24th of May, 1843, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of hospital stewards of the United States Army on duty in the city of Nashville, department of the Cumberland, praying for promotion and increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of paymasters' clerks, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of paymasters in the United States Army, praying for an increase of the salaries of paymasters' clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of soldiers who volunteered and enlisted in the service of the United States for the period of nine months, praying that a bounty of twenty-five dollars be granted to them, according to the act of Congress, approved July 17, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of J. E. Dawley, Barthol Wood, J. Dewey, jr., and J. W. Andrew, inspectors of the Boston and Charlestown district of customs, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the petition of Joseph R. Winchell and others, citizens of Missouri, praying for a commodious and speedy line of railway communication between Washington city and the city of New York; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Berendt A. Froiseth, praying for the payment to him of fifty dollars, which he alleges to be due him as assignee of Charles Colter, on a voucher dated May 10, 1861, against the Government of the United States, issued by the quartermaster and approved by the colonel, W. A. Gorman, of the first regiment Minnesota volunteers, to Charles Colter; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Marshal O. Roberts and others, trustees of A. G. Sloo, contractor for carrying the mails between New York, New Orleans, Havana, and Chagres, praying compensation for extra mail facilities on that route, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and appendix, have instructed me to report back the same with a recommendation that it pass.

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to affairs with the Indian tribes be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the benevolent institutions established or patronized by the Government in the District of Columbia be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the financial affairs of the United States be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the Post Office Department be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to military affairs be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the commercial interests of the United States be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the agricultural interests of the United States be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the public lands of the United States be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NAVAL ACTING APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of providing by law that appointments in the naval service, commonly called "acting appointments," be submitted to the Senate for confirmation, in all cases where similar appointments in the regular Navy are required to be submitted to the Senate.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution, which is identical with one which I first offered in this body twelve years ago, and I ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of commissioners to revise the public statutes of the United States; to simplify their language; to correct their incongruities; to supply their deficiencies; to arrange them in order; to reduce them to one connected text; and to report them thus improved to Congress for its final action, to the end that the public statutes, which all are presumed to know, may be in such form as to be more within the apprehension of all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that resolution had better lie over for the present.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it a resolution of inquiry altogether?

Mr. SUMNER. It is a resolution of inquiry. It is one that I have had the honor of offering in this body at every Congress for twelve years, and I hope during the present Congress to obtain some final action upon it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.)

Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. McDUGALL subsequently said: I raised an objection a short time since to the consideration of a resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. I desire now to withdraw that objection, understanding the resolution more distinctly than I did when it was first read.

Other business intervening, the withdrawal of the objection did not bring up the resolution for consideration.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. HALE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 9) prohibiting speculative transactions in gold, silver, and foreign exchange; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 10) for the relief of the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FOOT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 11) granting public lands to the People's Pacific Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraphic line to the Pacific coast by the northern route; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the bill lie on the table, and I beg leave to remark in a word, that it is not improbable that a special committee may be raised on the whole subject of a Pacific railroad, but I do not wish to bring myself within the rule of courtesy for a place on such committee by moving its appointment; but I will say that if such a committee shall be raised, I shall then move the reference of this bill to that committee; otherwise to some of the standing committees of the body. I move that the bill be printed.

The bill was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 12) extending the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grant of lands made by the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, though I believe the measure originated with the Committee on Agriculture. It seems to me more properly to belong to the Committee on Public Lands, and I therefore move that reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 13) to amend an act entitled "An act to define and punish certain conspiracies," passed July 31, 1861; as also the twenty-fourth section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 4) authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint a board of officers to audit the accounts of the citizens of Lawrence, Kansas; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. As I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate before this resolution shall be referred to a committee, I move that it lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and the officers and men who have fought under his command; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I propose to call up the resolution which I submitted a few days ago on the subject of the exchange of prisoners, and I propose to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes upon that resolution. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, which was submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the refusal of the rebel authorities to exchange negro soldiers, or their officers, or any class of prisoners from the United States Army, should not prevent or suspend exchanges by our military authorities for any other class of prisoners; and justice, policy, and humanity demand that, as fast as it can be done, our brave and suffering countrymen should be delivered from their captivity.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I understand from the report of the Secretary of War that there are in the rebel prisons in Richmond, and that neighborhood, about thirteen thousand white prisoners captured from the armies of the United States; that "well-authenticated statements show that our troops held as prisoners of war were deprived of shelter, clothing, and food, and some have perished from exposure and famine;" and that those prisoners "are now supplied with food and raiment by this Government, and by our benevolent and charitable associations and individuals." We have it from numerous and reliable sources of information, and from many of the captives themselves, that there is a state of great destitution in Richmond, and that their own sufferings for want of food, clothing, and proper prison apartments are very great; that from these causes many have already died, and others are daily dying. If those brave martyrs to their country's cause had been exchanged early in their captivity, many of them had not now perished from gaunt want and disease in loathsome prisons, but would have lived to return to their homes, their families, and their friends.

Why were not these true and heroic men exchanged within a reasonable time after their captivity? The Secretary of War, in his report, has spoken upon this subject, but not explicitly as to some points. He says:

"When the Government commenced organizing colored troops, the rebel leader, Davis, by solemn and official proclamation, announced that the colored troops and their white officers, if captured, would not be recognized as prisoners of war, but would be given up for punishment by the State authorities."

As I understand, here lies the chief difficulty between the United States and the rebels in relation to this matter of exchanging prisoners: they are required to treat negroes, captured by them with arms in their hands, and their officers, as prisoners of war, and to exchange them for white soldiers of their army captured by ours. General Hitchcock, our commissioner for the exchange of prisoners, says in a letter on this subject:

"It is generally known that when the Congress of the United States proceeded to authorize by law the employment of colored troops for the suppression of the rebellion, there was throughout the whole length and breadth of the South one universal cry of real or well-affected indignation, accompanied with the wildest threats of vengeance against such officers as might be captured with colored troops, while the colored soldiers themselves it was everywhere believed should be either 'returned or sold into slavery.' It was everywhere published throughout the South that this class of troops were not entitled to, and should not receive, the protection of the laws of war, and the strongest terms which infuriate madness could devise or invent were used in condemnation of the measure authorized by the United States Government."

When the Constitution, by express words, directs any operation of Government, and names the department or officer by which it is to be performed, and also the instrumentality and mode of performance, all other departments, officers, modes, and instrumentalities are excluded, and those named only can be legitimately used. This rule of construction is universally applied to all constitutions, and every other instrument of writing. Another undeniable principle, which has been often recognized by the Supreme Court, is, that when the Constitution vests in the United States any power, or charges them to do any act, all such provisions create legislative powers, and Congress alone can execute them.

The United States Government wholly, and, a fortiori, its departments and officers, singly or in any combination, cannot exercise any powers whatever but such as are conferred upon them by the Constitution. Many unenumerated auxiliary powers are positively necessary to enable the legislative, executive, and judicial departments to execute the powers which the Constitution by its language confers upon them respectively; but the whole of that indefinite mass of powers is expressly vested in Congress by this provision:

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof."

So far as the language of the Constitution, expressly in words or by their implication, vests powers in any department or officer, the department or officer named can exercise only them without legislation; and all other powers, however indispensably necessary to execute those conferred by the language of the Constitution, are vested exclusively in Congress, to be executed by itself, or by the particular department or officer to which they relate, or some other agency, as Congress by its law may name. Until it expressly by its law authorizes the President, or the judiciary, or any officer of the Government to exercise the auxiliary power, it would be usurpation and violation of the Constitution for either to assume it. This important principle is clearly embodied in that instrument, and is distinctly recognized by the Supreme Court, in these words:

"Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind, and authorized the General Government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a State, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department."

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on the application of the Legislature or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue; and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts nor in the Executive."

"So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution, providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and, by the act of February 28, 1795, provided, that 'in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.'"—7 Howard's Reports, p. 42, Luther vs. Borden.

Now, sir, that provision of the Constitution, and this decision of the Supreme Court in the important Dorr case, establish that the only legitimate power under our Constitution and our system of government to recognize what is and what is not a proper government of a State, to determine when the contingency of a disturbance in the State or an insurrection has happened, and to call out the proper agency to meet the case, is Congress, and Congress alone. The President cannot intervene in any such state of case until Congress by its law, as it did by the act of 1795, vests the power so to intervene in the initiatory in the President of the United States; and the court expressly and emphatically declared that Congress, if it had thought proper, might have vested this important discretion in the courts as well, but that they had acted wisely and practically in vesting it in the President of the United States.

By the Constitution Congress, and Congress alone, has power "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." To Congress exclusively, and not to the President, belongs the authority to recognize a state of resistance to the execution of the laws, of insurrection, or invasion, which requires the calling forth the military power. To devise measures and a policy to meet either of those conditions belongs to Congress, and not to the President. He has no authority to recognize even the existence of those states of case, and to put a military force in motion to meet them, without a law of Congress vesting him with that power. To Congress also belongs the authority to determine when the resistance to the execution of the laws has ceased, when the insurrection has been suppressed, and when the invasion has been repelled. The President cannot take cognizance of either of those questions without the authority of a law of Congress, and, in relation to insurrections, it has not passed such a law.

The questions whether Congress could employ or authorize the raising of any other forces to suppress the existing insurrection than militia, and whether negroes could properly constitute a part of that militia, might well be made. Numerous tribes of Indian savages of a great aggregate number, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, resided, and still reside, in the United States; would it be competent for Congress to authorize the organization of those savages as part of the military power to suppress the existing insurrection? I hold that the true principle of the Constitution is that insurrections are to be put down by citizens alone, and that negroes are not and cannot be made citizens. White men alone made our Government, and are the only parties to it. All our political partners are equal, and negroes cannot be admitted to that equality. The colonies had all held Africans as slaves and property from about 1650; and those that were brought from their country were imported and sold into the colonies principally by New England traders in that traffic. The rebellion against George III was first to resist aggression on the rights and liberties of the white man, and ultimately for his independence and self-government, and not of the negro. The old Articles of Confederation were made by the white man for his own defense and protection; the negro took no part in the work; nothing was assured to him by it, nor was he in any way its subject, or even thought of by the men who performed it.

When independence was declared, all the colonies before, and States afterwards, still held slaves; and that great transaction was by white men, related to and was for the benefit only of white men; and the status, rights, and privileges of no negro in America, slave or free, were conferred, enlarged, or in any way affected by it. When the Constitution was formed and adopted, no movement had been made by the States, except two, to abolish slavery; and it was formed by white men alone, as their Government, to secure only their rights and liberties, without conferring or intending to confer or recognize any in the negro, or touching in the remotest degree the condition of any one, bond or free, of that race. The negro slave is recognized by the Constitution as property, and provision is made by it for his rendition when he escapes from his owner into another State. The whole subject of slavery and the manumission of slaves was retained by the people of the several States as matter of their domestic and local policy, to be regulated exclusively by their own governments and themselves; and in these primary depositories the Constitution left the whole subject. But waiving, and even conceding, the power of Congress to authorize the enlistment of free negroes and slaves also, would it not have been the best policy not to have made soldiers of them? The slaves being property, the United States had the right to use them for labor on the same conditions as other property. As teamsters, laborers on military works, and in other ways, many more of them than have been enlisted could have been advantageously used, and the white men so employed could have been put in the field. They would then have been of more value than they will be as soldiers; and another cause of intense aversion and of united and desperate resistance by the rebels, and of deep dissatisfaction of the loyal slaveholders everywhere, would have been avoided. The obloquy of taking from loyal and true men their property by the Government which they were striving to uphold, would not have fixed its indelible stain on our national character. The difficulty of the rebels having negroes taken prisoners in battle, with arms in their hands, fighting against their owners, and refusing to exchange for them as prisoners of war, would not have arisen.

But conceding, for the argument, that it was both legally right and wise policy to enlist negro slaves in the armies of the United States, the present question is, shall ten times as many white soldiers languish in want and destitution in loathsome prisons, and many of them die of consequent starvation and disease, to force the rebels to exchange their negro prisoners? I have seen in the papers within the last few months this statement about this matter: Mr. Lincoln was written to, and requested to suspend all exchanges of prisoners until the rebels would exchange the white officers of negro troops who had been captured by them. The President was represented as refusing to take that position, because, first, there were not many prisoners of the class of officers of negro corps, and it would be unjust to the greatly more numerous class of white prisoners who were not in that category. Second, the white officers who undertook to command negro forces got quicker promotion than if they had remained or joined the service in white corps. Third, those officers knew this hazard of their service before they assumed it, by the previous threats of Jeff. Davis and the rebel authorities, published in the newspapers.

Every person will concede that the United States authorities, having enlisted negro soldiers, whether rightfully or wrongfully, are bound to make all reasonable efforts to protect them as captives; but not by continuing white men in prison where they are in a perishing condition for want of raiment and food, and many of them are dying from diseases thereby engendered. If this protraction of their sufferings, this loss of health and mortality of many of the white captives, would prolong the lives or give increased health and strength or comforts to the negro prisoners, then there might be a seeming pretext, for those who give the first place in their sympathies to that race, for white men to be continued in torture, and even to die by starvation, for their good. But when the protraction of the sufferings of the white prisoners brings no alleviation to the negroes, what is the motive with our authorities to continue them? It is, that the wasting forms, the waning health, and the dying groans of our heroic white captive soldiers in Libby and other rebel prisons shall continue, until they create a moral force to constrain the rebel authorities to deliver from captivity at the same time the prisoners of both races. If the rebels, in this matter, violate the usages of modern warfare, punish them, and not citizens and white men, who volunteered in the cause of the Union, the Constitution, and the laws, and who are so unfortunate as to be prisoners. If the officials who thus continue them in miserable captivity could be sent to take their places, I would not interpose a word of objection. But, according to my conception of justice, humanity, and policy, I insist that early and energetic efforts should have been made, should now and should continue to be made, for their exchange. If every man in captivity from our armies were white, and the rebel authorities were willing to exchange for part, and not for all, those that could be should be delivered from such a horrid captivity. Our Government should make every effort for the liberation of all; but failing as to part, it would be cruel injustice for it to decide that the others should remain until their captors would consent that all should go forth. Brave and magnanimous men would never ask that their companions in prison should be held there to languish and die because they could not get out, but in the realization of its horrors, and the nobleness of their own hearts, they would exclaim, "let all who can go free."

This is another point of collision in the war between the two races that has been slowly arising for many years, that was destined in the ordinary course of events to increase in extent and fierceness, and which fanatics and demagogues are recklessly urging forward, even though it should become demoniac in its character. The abolitionists are the original architects of this great civil war. Slavery and property in African slaves was established by the practice of the civilized world, upheld by the laws of nations, protected by the laws of the original thirteen States, and recognized by the Federal Constitution, and, where it existed in any State, declared by Mr. Lincoln himself to be outside of the pale of his authority as President, and also of Congress. The people of one State had no right to assail slavery in another State, because the subject belonged exclusively to the State and its people. But some of the people of the free States, as far back as 1832, began to agitate against slavery in other States. They established newspapers to labor in that work. They proclaimed, "no union with slaveholders." They denounced the Constitution, because it recognized slavery and gave some protection to the owners of that property, as "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." They, for that cause, made incessant war upon the Constitution for its overthrow, and were impelled, by their malignant and frenzied hate of it, publicly to burn a copy of it. The glorious ensign of the United States, the creation of the Constitution, they scoffed and denounced as a flaunting lie. By sermons, lectures, and public addresses, in tracts and treatises, in the family circle, the school-house, and the pulpit, by printing and pictorial representations, they circulated thousands of flagitious falsehoods against slaveholders. With daring impiety they declared that "if the Bible recognized slavery it was not their Bible; if God sanctioned slavery he was not their God."

The members of the churches North cut off from their religious fellowship members of the same churches South. The execution of the fugitive slave law was resisted by armed mobs in several of the free States, by acts of outrageous violence and murder; and by an insurrection in Massachusetts, which made war and committed treason against the United States, and murdered a citizen employed in the execution of its law. The first fugitive slave law had been passed by Congress under Washington's administration and approved by him; and the constitutionality of it, and of the law of 1850, had been sustained by the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court and all the district courts of the United States; and yet some half dozen of the free States passed laws avowedly to antagonize with and defeat their provisions. Those who executed or assisted in the execution of the fugitive slave laws of Congress were declared felons by the laws of those States, and subject to be punished by confinement in their penitentiaries. The personal liberty law of Ohio was framed specially to defeat the fugitive slave law in that State, and to punish as felons all who executed or aided in its execution. The two laws were in direct conflict; and if one was executed the other was thereby nullified; and the present Secretary of the Treasury, when Governor of Ohio, issued his proclamation, declaring that the law of Ohio should be executed if it required all the forces of that State to execute it. It was by these infractions of the Constitution and these outrages that so many of the southern people were prepared to be beguiled by their ambitious and corrupt leaders into a rebellion against a Government that had never oppressed them, and that was the best hope of their country and of mankind.

Secession was no remedy for any evil, but was certain to aggravate all existing evils, and to introduce a thousand more, inestimably more grievous. Instead of protecting or adding a tittle to the security of slave property, it has, as I declared in my public addresses before it came, damaged slavery a thousand times more than all the causes that were then actively working against it. Yea, I then said that slavery would be in danger of utter subversion from northern demagogues and fanatics, presidential and congressional usurpations of power, and the quickened cupidity and passions of millions of people. Before the rebellion the abolitionists were but a small and impotent faction. Their achievements had been extensively to poison and frenzy the minds and hearts of the people of the free States against all slaveholders, and to get up sporadic riots and murders, and the Boston insurrection, which was suppressed by President Fillmore; to prevent the execution of the fugitive slave law; and the raid of John Brown into Virginia. But the rebellion has given that faction tremendous force, and the present possession of the Government, a soldiery counted by hundreds of thousands, and millions of good people who previously rejected their projects as unconstitutional, revolutionary, and destructive. It enabled that faction to conscript the last Congress, the President and his Cabinet, the armies and navies of the United States, and the entire Republican party, which it dyed very black, into its service; and with those mighty forces and allies it seems to be sweeping triumphantly on, over the prostrate Constitution of the United States and the liberties of the people, to the utter annihilation of slavery, and the overthrow of the constitutions, laws, and social organization of all the slave States. They are now reveling and frantic in the possession and exercise of unlimited power. They may bring down ruin upon slavery and the rebel States; they may subvert our system of government, consisting of a divided sovereignty between the nation and the States; they may, for the time, override all the rights and the liberties of the people, guaranteed to them in their Constitution, by a military despotism; but sooner or later the freemen of America, around whom they are throwing chains which they hope to rivet at the next presidential election, will arouse themselves from their lethargy, and, in the potential vindication of free speech, of a free press, and free elections, they will rescue their Constitution and popular liberty from these destructives, and restore the Union as it was, raise aloft a prostrate Constitution, enforce the laws to our utmost limits, assure all the people, North and South, the practical enjoyment of all their rights, privileges, and liberties, and thus bring back to our torn and bleeding country security, peace, fraternity, and happiness.

But if this glorious regeneration should be defeated by the destructives interposing by the bayonet, and by that mode getting lease of power another term, they would bring down upon the whole country a civil war more extensive, bloody, and frightful than the world has ever witnessed, and before the glowing, baleful fires of which those now burning would pale. The raging storm would sweep over the feeble men in power; and another Cromwell or Bonaparte, for whom they had prepared the way, would be called up by the heaving and tumbling of the whole social fabric, and would sweep them in their utter helplessness from their unstable places and power into sudden ruin and eternal infamy.

At the beginning of the rebellion, the exhibition of unity and devotion by the people of the loyal States to their Union and their Constitution and Government was sublime, while the dissension of the people of the seceded States gave bright omen of their early submission. Then was the time to move upon the insurrection under the canopy of the Constitution and laws, with the sword in the one hand and the olive branch in the other. If the United States authorities had moved into any of the rebel States, except South Carolina, and taken possession with an army sufficient to hold it, and to give protection and security to all its people, two thirds of them would have acknowledged and would have adhered faithfully to their country and its symbol, "the stars and the stripes."

Congress and the President began a right the suppression of the insurrection. He declared that he had "neither the power nor the inclination to interfere with slavery in the States;" that if he possessed himself of land, and another man of slaves, they "both had an equal and the same guarantee of Constitution and law for their property." In communication to the Emperor of the French, through Secretary Seward and Minister Dayton, he said:

"The rights of the States and the condition of every human being in them will remain precisely the same, whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it shall fail. In one case the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other they would, as now, be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions, in either case will remain the same."

The Senate, within four days after the first battle of Bull Run, except three Senators, and the House of Representatives I believe with entire unanimity, passed Mr. Crittenden's just, wise, and imperishable resolution. That resolution cannot be too often read by the American people; it cannot be too deeply graven on their memories and their hearts and their minds, and I therefore again read it:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Sir, if there were ever words of truth and wisdom conceived or written or spoken by man since he was created, they are embodied in that wise and statesmanlike resolution. If that had remained the law of the war to put down this rebellion, and competent leaders and sufficient force had been thrown into the field to conduct it, the war would long ago have ceased by the submission of the rebel States, and the reconstruction of the Union under our glorious Constitution.

But by the next session, the party in power in the two Houses, who had resolved upon the destruction of slavery, fas aut nefas, commenced systematic and well-considered operations to effectuate their fixed and cherished object; but the President proceeded with characteristic caution and address. But not only the numbers but the purposes of this party have grown and expanded. Their first phase was to sever the States and to subvert the Constitution by making many years' war upon both, because they protected slavery. But having forced Congress and the President to disregard all the guards and restraints of the Constitution, and usurp the necessary powers to effect it, the entente cordiale is established between them by which one of the contracting parties is to have all power, constitutional and usurped, for another term, leaving the future thereafter to take care of itself; and the other party is to have the utter extinction of slavery, not with the sudden and revolutionary violence they desired, but if more slowly more surely, and with less danger of a reaction that would be fatal to both parties.

The original abolitionists, and many of their new converts, now boldly declare for negro equality; and their most eloquent orator goes the whole figure, "liberty, equality, brotherhood, and amalgamation." The President, in a public speech in this city, on the occasion of a great rejoicing for the great and important successes of our arms on the Mississippi, said:

"Eighty-old years since, the 4th day of July, for the first time in the world, a union body of representatives declared, as a self-evident truth, that all men were created equal."

"Another of our Presidents, fifty years afterwards, was called from the stage of existence, and on the same day of the month; and now, on this 4th day of July just passed, when a gigantic rebellion has risen in the land, precisely at the bottom of which is an effort to overthrow that principle, that all men are created equal, we have a surrender of one of their most powerful positions and powerful armies forced upon them that very day."

And more recently, at the consecration of the Soldiers' Cemetery at Gettysburg, he spoke to the same effect upon the point of equality. So he, too, has not only surrendered constitutional and legal slavery to the abolitionists, but he has declared publicly for white and negro and universal equality. Equality without amalgamation is impossible; but I venture this opinion, that any amalgamation he may declare for will be theatrical. Indeed, I have yet to learn that any of them teach by example as well as by precept. The President goes for this equality upon the self-evident law of nature. The practice of the world for three thousand five hundred years, the laws of nations, the constitutions and laws of all the States at one time, and still of a large number of them, the Constitution of the United States, the judgments of the Supreme Court, of the whole American judiciary, recognize and establish property in slaves, which is expressly guaranteed to the owners by the amendatory provisions of the Constitution; and yet the President, by his edict, attempts to deprive their owners of that property, and at one swoop at many States declares that the loyal as well as disloyal owners are deprived of them. He asserts that his proclamation, and their enlistment in the military service, not only frees but makes citizens of them at the end of their service. Citizens of one State, by the Constitution, have all the rights and privileges of citizens in the other States.

I suppose, then, that under the magic power which I believe the President deduces from military necessity, he is authorized to issue his imperial edict to override the Constitution of the United States, the laws and constitutions of all the slave States, to nullify the decisions of the Supreme Court and of all its justices; and by his word, by his mighty fiat, in the remote absence as well as the immediate presence of armies, to knock the fetters from the slaves, and proclaim them to be free. Sir, if the President of the United States has that imperial power, he is the greatest of living autocrats; the greatest of all the autocrats that have ever lived. The Czar of all the Russias and the leaden despot of Austria have tame and impotent powers when contrasted with this imperial emperor of this western world.

Sir, there are many States, free States, in the Union that prohibit free negroes from settling within their limits; they have positive laws to prohibit their intermarriage with the whites; and those laws obtain in slave and in free States. It is a law of my own State; and in addition to that, although in Kentucky a man may liberate his slaves, he is required by our constitution to take them outside the limits of the State. And yet this potent edict, this proclamation of Abraham I, this imperial ukase looms up with a vigor and a power that no man two years ago ever imagined or dreamed of; overrides the Constitution of the United States, all its guarantees of liberties, rights, and privileges; all its restrictions and limitations of power; overturns the laws and constitutions of the sovereign States of the United States, because, except within the limited scope of the powers of the United States, the States and their governments are sovereign. Within the scope of its powers, the Government of the United States is paramount, supreme. Every constitution and law of a State, every judicial decision, every principle announced by any State governmental authority that comes in conflict with the powers of the General Government, as conferred by the Constitution, falls to the ground. But, then, so far as that Constitution does not vest the original power of the States, the original political sovereignty of the States and the people of the States, it remains to them; and it is an essential and vital principle of our system that the limits between the two governments shall be kept separate and distinct, and it is as much unauthorized and unconstitutional for the President and the authorities of the United States to encroach upon their portion of the divided sovereignty, the reserved rights of the States and the people, all, indeed, that is not conferred by the language of the Constitution on the General Government, as it is for the States or their authorities or people to encroach upon the Federal power. The officers of either, when they attempt by an array of armed men to resist the execution of the laws of the other, are respectively guilty of the crime of treason against the United States, or against the particular State whose laws are thus opposed and attempted to be overthrown by military men.

* My State does not recognize any political, much less social equality on the part of the negro with the white man, whether the negro be bond or free. I think it never will. It makes it a penal offense for any clergyman to intermarry between the races. The free negroes have no eligibility to office, no right of suffrage, and I trust never will have any with us. And yet, sir, in my State there is as much humanity, as much of kind treatment to the negro population, as there is in the vaunted North, or anywhere beside. But this presidential proclamation looms up. It conscripts all the negroes that the military officers may choose, whether they are slave or free, whether they belong to the loyal or disloyal, into the armies of the United States. It declares that from thenceforth they are and shall be free; and the President says, in addition, that when they have served out their time of service they become citizens of the United States. Mr. President, [Mr. FOSTER in the chair,] you are a lawyer, you are a constitutional lawyer, you are a conservative statesman. You know, and I know, that there are but two classes of citizenship in the United States. We might differ upon the broad principle whether citizenship was restricted exclusively to the white race, which is my principle, but upon this subordinate question, I know, sir, that you and I would accord in opinion. There are but two modes by which citizenship of the United States can be obtained. The one is by birth, the other is by a uniform rule of naturalization prescribed by Congress. The whole subject of acquiring citizenship, except by birth, is, by express provision of the Constitution, vested in Congress. That provision necessarily excludes from the President, or from any other functionary of the Government, all power to interfere with the subject. It shares this power with no other officer or authority in this Government; and yet here comes up the President's proclamation and annuls, annihilates that principle of the Constitution. As I before said, it sweeps away all the State constitutions and State laws that conflict with it. The portals of the State governments and all their honors, trusts, and offices are thus, volens volens, in defiance of their constitutions and laws, opened to the negroes, who are thus to become freedmen, and then citizens, by the President's proclamation. The Constitution declares expressly that the citizens of one State shall have all the rights and privileges of citizens of the other States; and therefore no State constitution, no State laws, would make any discrimination as to rights and privileges between these citizens of African descent, thrown off from the presidential mint, and its white citizens. They thus become eligible to all the offices of the States. Their Legislatures, their judicial departments, their Executives, are all opened to them by this new and all-dominating power. What is its effect in relation to the Government of the United States? It also opens all the offices of the United States to them. They thereby become eligible to seats in the two Houses of Congress, to the supreme and inferior courts. They may be appointed to foreign embassies, and become candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency. It produces all these mighty changes in the organization of our Government in its great and fundamental principles, and the harmony, like that of the spheres, between the Federal and State Governments, is broken up by the President bringing into active operation the undefined and undefinable, but tremendous, powers conferred upon him by "military necessity." There is no restriction, no limit, to this, his power, in time of war, but it reigns supreme over everybody and everything. Such is his novel but imperial theory.

Sir, I, for one, protest, and intend to protest as long as I have reason and voice, against such a monstrous and destructive revolution as the Executive is striving to consummate. The Constitution of the United States is supreme. The President of the United States has but limited powers, and they are expressly named and conferred by that instrument. Every power which is included by name and necessary implication in the language used in conferring those powers upon him is certainly carried with it; but those unnumbered, auxiliary powers which are necessary and proper and indispensable to organize our Government, and to put its departments in complete operation, are, by express language, vested in Congress, and the President can no more touch one of them, until he is authorized to do so by an express act of Congress, than he can establish a monarchy and place a crown upon his head.

Mr. President, this war of races is urged on. It is urged on by infatuated reason or by sinister design. Be the cause the one or the other, its effects to the country and to our system of government are the same. Whatever the motive may be for these reckless innovations, these outrageous usurpations of power and infractions of the Constitution, their consequences are the same. I admit that a great many men abhor the rebellion. I do, myself, from my deepest soul. I believe that its authors have committed the greatest crime of which the records of the world make any mention; but, sir, even if it were necessary, I would not permanently give up the Constitution of my country, and the liberties which it secures to the people, to prevent this division of the Union; I would not give up the freedom and the charter of freedom which was fabricated by Washington and his immortal associates. What would a great and extended country be worth to men who love freedom, if it be ruled by a consolidated military despotism? I adhere to the Constitution; I will fight under it and for it, and in avoiding the Scylla of secession, I never will willingly rush into the destroying gulf, the Charybdis of abolition military centralization and despotism; and yet, while so many people are avoiding the one source of destruction, they are rushing heedlessly on to the other.

Sir, there is but one definition of loyalty, and that is, fidelity to the Constitution and to all its agents, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, in the constitutional and legal performance of their duties. All the officers of those three classes, and no part of them, form the administration of it. The Government is the Constitution and laws of the United States. When that Government is assailed by open and audacious rebels, or by those who are administering, conspiring to, or by ignorance or maladministration subverting it, whether from Congress, or the President, or the Army, there is no true loyalty but to defend it, the Constitution and the laws, against any or all those assailants.

Mr. President, how infinitely better it would have been for the South, and the whole United States, had they never seceded and never reared the standard of rebellion! If their military power in every field could have been stricken down and annihilated by the armies of the Union within six or twelve months after the firing on Fort Sumter, by wise and constitutional administration, the great mass of the southern people would have yielded long since to the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States; the Union would have been restored, and a united country would now be progressing in a career of peace and prosperity. Sir, if my fiat could prevail, if my aspiration to Omnipotence could be heard and granted, it would be for the defeat of the rebel armies everywhere to-morrow, not only for the good of my own State, for my own Government, for the loyal States, but especially for the rebel States, the deluded and misguided masses. The longer this war continues, the worse it will be for the people in rebellion, and how infinitely worse for the slave institution of those States! The abolitionists are as deeply impressed with these truths as I am. The great mass of the moderate, conservative Republicans, at one time did not act with them, but they and that party, and hundreds and thousands of others who did not belong to either organization, and the whole Government of the United States, are now combined to put down slavery there now, and ultimately everywhere.

But, sir, the party in power has modified its purposes and its policy since the commencement of this war. With the abolitionists proper, then and now, the avowed object was to wipe out slavery; but the politicians of the party in power, the Administration, which Mr. Phillips declared to be only a committee located in Washington for the management of the next presidential canvass, have, as I conceive, three objects at this time, and their objects are in this order: the first and paramount is to perpetuate their own party power at all hazards, and, by all the means which the people of the United States will tolerate them to use, to continue themselves and their friends in office, to have the distribution of the greatest and richest amount of spoils, of the largest patronage of offices civil and military, and the disbursement of a revenue, that the world has ever known. Their second purpose is to annihilate slavery everywhere in the United States; and their third one is, after the constitutions and the liberties of the States are subverted by their usurpations of power, to hold the States together upon the fragments of a shattered Constitution by the despotic, military, imperial power which they intend to found upon the revolution and ruin of our entire system.

Sir, in relation to the particular subject before the Senate, I would ask, how many negro soldiers are now in the service of the United States, and how many of them are prisoners? The Secretary of War reports some fifty thousand, if I recollect aright. I believe there is no such number. I doubt whether there are, in actual service, half that number fit and armed for military duty; but they say they will go on conscripting and enlisting and organizing until they raise a negro force of three hundred thousand. The Secretary of War, as I understand, says that he intends to commence enlistments of the negro population, free and slave, into the regular Army for five years. The General-in-Chief proclaimed months ago—I give the substance and meaning of his language—that we would carry on this war triumphantly to the subjugation of the rebels, and when it closed we would plant our feet upon the necks of the sneaks (to use his phrase) who had dared to oppose the war policy of the President. Sir, you could never enlist a white force to do that work of despotism, of crime, and of cruelty. The general-in-chief for such a work must have a force of Janizaries, such as the Ottoman Porte had, or of Mamelukes, like that force of the Pacha of Egypt, to execute his vile and diabolical behests. But even those palace guards of half barbarian despots became so intolerable that they were exterminated by their employers.

But, sir, do these high military dignitaries contemplate that this war is to continue five years from this time? It would seem so, from the reported declarations of policy by Mr. Stanton. A distinguished man in the West, who was at one time a member of the other House of Congress, told me that a major general in the service of the United States now in command, who has rendered distinguished service in the field, told him that if Mr. Lincoln was defeated at the next presidential election, he would not yield his seat of power to his successor, but would hold on it, and this he could only do by the Army. I suppose these negro Janizaries and Mamelukes who are now about to be enlisted into the regular Army, under such leaders as Fremont and Hunter and other negro generals, are to be organized as the imperial guards or pretorian bands, to enable them to retain the power which they contemplate, if necessary, to continue by usurpation, by the force and power of the Army, if they do not succeed in electing a successor to the President by the interference of the military at the polls to control the elections.

Sir, here is another phase of the spasmodic attempt of "the powers that be" to repeal the unalterable law of the God of our common nature, which has decreed the negro to occupy a subordinate condition to the white man. All the false philanthropy, all the hypocritical pretensions, all the best devised schemes that shallow statesmen and pretended philanthropists and loud hypocrites and demagogues may make to repeal this unalterable law of Jehovah, and to bring up the negro to social and political equality with the white man, will fail. Weak men have arisen to force this equality on the white race, and measure strength with the Omnipotent upon this great question of races, but their utter discomfiture will prove to them how powerless is puny man when he would interfere with the providence of the Eternal. There is upholding that law of our Creator the sentiments, organizations, and revulsion of the white race. It never has, and I believe never will, accept any such equality. Why, then, shall the miserable authorities at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue insist that the languishing, starving, diseased, and dying white man shall still remain in Libby prison, merely to keep the negro out of it? Was there anything in the policy or administration of men ever so absurd, so inhuman, and so wicked?

Sir, a good many of us probably have kindred in Libby prison. I have. I know the nature and nobleness of my nephew there, and I know that if he was in a class of white men which the rebel authorities would refuse to exchange, and even the negroes could be exchanged without the white men, he would say to the negroes, and with how much more alacrity and emotion would he say to his white comrades, "though I cannot follow you to the home of my fathers, to my loved native land, to glorious old Kentucky, let the prison door swing wide open, and you who can go free as the mountain air."

Sir, in conclusion, this policy is eminently insulting as well as cruel to the white prisoners. It marks the incapacity, the dogged obstinacy, and the heartless cruelty of the Secretary of War and of the General-in-Chief. I have no doubt that it was with them that this policy originated of no exchange of white prisoners unless the negroes too are exchanged. It will be rejected and corrected by the great and generous and true people of America. No, Mr. President, I say away with all negro equality. It is impossible; and when it is sought to bring that visionary and mischievous principle to the continuance of white men in a starving, diseased, and languishing prison, until the negroes can also go free, it is cruel and outrageous.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts waive his motion for a moment?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I need not say to the honorable member from Kentucky that I hold his opinions upon all questions, either of law or of morals, in high respect; and therefore, when I rise to express a difference of opinion as to some of the legal propositions which he has stated, he will understand me as doing it under the influence of that very sincere respect.

His resolution, if I understand it correctly, declares that the refusal of the rebel authorities to exchange negro soldiers whom they have captured, or the officers who may have been in command of colored soldiers, is no reason why the exchanging should not go on as to other classes. He may not only apply his principle to colored soldiers and the officers of colored soldiers, but to any other class whom the rebel authorities may refuse to exchange. It is due to myself to say that in that opinion I entirely concur. Whether in point of fact the exchanges have been arrested upon the ground assumed hypothetically in the resolution offered by the member from Kentucky, I am not advised; but assuming that ground to be the correct one, I submit to the Senate, as in my judgment perfectly clear, that policy, and humanity, which is always the highest policy, would demand that exchanges should, notwithstanding, be permitted to go on. There are, I suppose, now in the hands of the rebel government, or I will assume that there are in the hands of the rebel government, some one hundred or two hundred colored soldiers, with some two or three officers commanding them—white men; and it is said that the rebel government refuse, and mean to insist upon that refusal, to deliver them up at any time hereafter; that they will hold them responsible to the authorities of the respective States from which the negroes may have come or in which the negroes may be, or responsible to the authority of the confederate government. Now, all that I think would be necessary, in order to meet a proposition of that sort, would be to keep in our own hands the like number of their prisoners, and treat such number precisely in the same mode in which they are treating or may hereafter treat the negro soldiers and their white commanders. We have done that in an instance which is quite familiar of course to the Senate. The rebel authorities thought proper, for some cause which they said justified it, but in my opinion clearly did not, to seize upon two of our officers, men of high repute, unquestioned loyalty to us, especially dear to the States from which they respectively came, with a determination that they should be hung; and, instead of refusing to exchange the prisoners generally that we had at that time, all that the Executive did was to place in close confinement, with a declaration of a purpose to deal with them thereafter as our own men should be dealt with by the rebel government, two of the rebel officers in our possession—a General Lee and somebody else; but notwithstanding that, the exchanges went on in the usual way.

I repeat, therefore, that assuming as true the facts stated in the resolution proposed by the member from Kentucky, I think he is right in saying that policy and humanity demand that the exchange, with such exceptions as may be necessary to meet the particular exigency, should go on. Unless all reports are false, we have thousands and thousands of soldiers, dear to us all, now in the prisons in Richmond and elsewhere, who are almost in a state of starvation. If we adhere to this principle of refusing to exchange until we can get included within the privilege of exchange the black soldiers and their white officers, the few who are in possession of the rebels, nobody can tell how many of these good men of ours, patriotic men, gallant men, who at the very tap of the drum rallied to support the Constitution, may have fallen victims to the barbarity of the rebels. Hence, as far as the particular resolution is concerned, provided the fact be as the Senator from Kentucky supposes in the resolution it to be, I should vote in favor of his resolution.

But I hope sincerely that the fact is not correctly stated in the resolution. I can hardly believe that the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, or the General-in-Chief would go to the extent of refusing to exchange the thousands and thousands of prisoners who are in our possession, when, by doing so, they could get absolved from their captivity the thousands who are in the possession of the rebels, upon the mere ground that the rebel government has refused to release some one hundred or two hundred prisoners of a certain class, for reasons peculiar to that class. I suppose, although perhaps it is not distinctly stated, that what the Senator means is that there should be an exchange of man for man, if the rebel government are willing to exchange man for man, and of course the exchanges will stop whenever they refuse to deliver man for man; and when we come to ask for the exchange of these negro soldiers and their officers, if they refuse to include them in the exchange, we will retain in our own hands a number of their prisoners equivalent to the number of that class who may be in their possession.

But I did not rise, Mr. President, so much for the purpose of expressing concurrence in the object which the Senator has in view, as disclosed by his particular resolution, as to express with all becoming deference a difference of opinion upon one or two of the questions which he has so ably presented to the Senate. I am not sure that I exactly caught the argument by the member from Kentucky, and if I state it incorrectly I beg that he will put me right. If I understood him aright, he denies not only to the President the authority to call upon soldiers of African descent, whether free or slave at the time they may be called upon, but he denies to Congress the authority to authorize the President to call soldiers of that class.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator from Maryland will permit me—

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) Does the Senator from Maryland give way to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely suggested that question; and while I expressly declared my concurrence in the affirmative, yet in my argument I forbore to make and to press the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think, then, Mr. President, that I have in substance misapprehended the honorable member. The power of the President of the United States to put down insurrection or invasion is altogether an executive power; the power to provide for the manner in which it shall be done is a legislative power. The latter is, by the Constitution of the United States, devolved upon Congress; the other upon the President. The language of the two clauses of the Constitution—the one designating the legislative department and the powers which the department shall exercise, and the other designating the executive department and the powers which that department shall exercise—is not the same. The honorable member will find, I am sure, that I am right in this. If he look to the first article of the Constitution he will find that it is preceded by a preamble, which says that Congress shall have the powers "herein granted;" and those words necessarily exclude the possession of any powers except such as are delegated expressly, or as may reasonably be implied from such as are expressly delegated. The clause which confers the executive power is yet more sweeping, and has been held to be more sweeping by many of the most enlightened constitutional jurists of the country. It declares that "the executive power" shall be vested in the President, and the opinion has been entertained by very many very able men that every power which belongs to the Government, and which is in its nature executive, (irrespective of the question whether the particular power is designated or not as a power to be exercised by the President,) is in the President by virtue of the general designation that "the executive power" shall be in the President of the United States.

Now, the Senate will of course remember that so far as the objection of the honorable member from Kentucky is concerned, as to the authority to call out soldiers of African descent, the prohibition upon the legislative department of the Government must be the same as the prohibition upon the executive department of the Government, if there be any in either. The language of the particular clause which gives to Congress the authority to provide for insurrections, in so many words and in the same words, gives them the authority to provide for repelling invasion. Not to be at all in error as to the words used, it is better that I should read the words of the clause itself: "Congress shall have power" "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Thus the honorable member will see that the authority of Congress with reference to the exercise of the military power conferred upon Congress to suppress insurrection is identical with, and consequently of the same extent as, the power with which they are clothed to repel invasion. Everything, therefore, that Congress could do by legislation in order to repel an invasion actually existing or anticipated, they can do to suppress an insurrection; and the consequence, therefore, is (if the honorable Senator is right in his view of the power conferred upon Congress) that if we were now being invaded or about to be invaded by a foreign foe, the Congress of the United States could not authorize the employment of soldiers of African descent. Why not? Who is to constitute the militia is not stated in the Constitution at all, so far as the congressional power is concerned. That depends upon the States.

But Congress has another power independent of that. Congress has the power, and without any limitation as to the mode of its exercise, of raising armies. How? Of what materials? The Constitution does not say that the armies are to consist of white men; it does not say that it is to be done by volunteering; but the power is a general and a sweeping one, to raise armies. What for, among other things? To put down insurrection as far as our domestic concerns are concerned in the first place, and in the second place to repel a foreign foe. Could not Congress employ black troops to repel a foreign foe, provided they were free? I steer clear now of the question of slavery. My friend will pardon me for saying that I never heard it doubted before.

The extent of the power with reference to the men who are to constitute the armies to be raised by the United States, is no greater than the power conferred upon Congress to provide for a navy; and who has ever heard that black men may not be enlisted in the Navy? There is not a ship afloat carrying the naval flag of the United States that has not a portion of the crew black. There was not a ship afloat during the war of 1812, that gave such undying honor to the American naval flag, that had not more or less sailors of African descent on board; and no one ever questioned the validity of such an enlistment. Consequently, unless Congress has been wrong from the beginning of the Government up to the present hour with reference to the Navy, it necessarily follows that, although the policy until now has not been expressly adopted of providing for the recruiting of soldiers of African descent in the Army, they must have the power; and if they come to the conclusion that they have not the power, then they must repeal all the laws existing upon the statute-book which provide, and which have been practically carried out from the beginning of the Government to the present day, for the enlistment of negro seamen on board our ships-of-war.

If I understood the honorable member from Kentucky aright in another particular, he places his negation of the power upon the ground that these negroes are not citizens within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. What is the influence of that proposition, if it be true in point of law, upon the question before us? In the case of Dred Scott, a majority of the Supreme Court decided that, with reference to the judiciary clause in the Constitution, which gives to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in certain cases, in which it makes the existence of the jurisdiction dependent upon the character of the litigants, they are not citizens, whether free or not. But that is a very different question from the question which arises under the two clauses of the Constitution to which I have adverted. They may not be citizens entitled to call upon the United States, through its judiciary, to do them justice as between themselves and others; but they are subject to the laws of the United States, protected by the power of the United States, owing allegiance to the United States; I speak now of the free. One would be inclined to think, as a necessary inference, that he who is bound by the laws, protected by the power of the Government, he who commits treason if he violates the laws by force, is bound, when called upon, to fly to the standard of the country, and protect it against civil insurrection or invasion from abroad.

But again, if my honorable friend is right, this would follow: the man of African descent is not to be enlisted, according to his theory, because he is not a citizen of the United States. How many are in the Army of the United States now, white men, who are not citizens? Has it ever been suggested that we cannot take as a recruit into the Army, now or at any time, him who, flying from what he supposes to be the oppression of the Old World, and coming here for the enjoyment of the liberty which is promised him by our institutions, offers to volunteer in advance of his citizenship, or that he cannot be called upon in advance of his citizenship to rally around the Government of his proposed adoption? Certainly not. The fact, therefore, that the particular recruit is not a citizen, whether it is because of his color, because of his descent, or because of his birthplace, is no objection to the right of Congress to call upon him to defend the country in a case of exigency. I think, therefore, and I submit it with entire respect to my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, that he is mistaken in supposing that Congress has no authority to call upon troops of African descent.

That brings me, in the second place, to inquire whether the President, independently of the exercise of its power by Congress, has that authority. Why not? It is unnecessary to argue it, as I will show the Senator in a moment; but why not? Let me suppose as barely possible—and, for the purpose of testing the principle, I have a right to make the supposition—that there are no armies provided by Congress, and no navy. The Constitution does not of itself create an army or create a navy. The power potentially is vested in the Congress of the United States, but it is practically nugatory until exercised. Then I have a right to assume that Congress may not exercise it. Well, suppose they have not done so; what follows? The President, under another clause of the Constitution, is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, bound to provide for the faithful execution of the laws, or rather, to use the words of the Constitution, "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." What laws? All the laws, organic or legislative; and consequently, if a foreign foe is about to put his foot in a hostile attitude upon the soil of the United States, which by the Constitution is ours as against all nations, and Congress have not furnished him with an army to repel and drive him out; or if insurrection raises its horrid front and seeks to destroy the Government, is he not at liberty to call around him, at once, the whole power of the United States, the whole physical power of the United States, irrespective of color? Congress can do so, as I think I have shown. Then he can do so.

If Congress have not furnished him with the particular means by which Congress thinks he would be enabled to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed, and to discharge the duty imposed upon him by that clause of the Constitution, then he must look elsewhere. He cannot force men to his standard; but he can call for volunteers. Who can doubt that? And if volunteers rally around the standard of the country in virtue of the call, are they not legally and constitutionally in the service of the United States, although brought into that service merely by the executive proclamation? I submit, Mr. President, as perfectly clear, that such must be the result.

Now, sir, there is but one other matter to which I wish to advert. The honorable member from Kentucky seems to suppose that the President, in what he has been doing and is now doing with reference to the enlistment of slaves, is violating a clear constitutional duty. Sir, it is not necessary to contend that in the absence of congressional legislation the President would have no authority to call upon the male slave population of the United States to protect the United States against insurrection or invasion. Congress has clothed him with the power; so that the question which the honorable member will have to meet, before he can succeed in making good his proposition, is whether Congress has not the power to call upon the slave population to take part in a war which is striking at the very existence of the Government. Why not? This population, as we all know, has a double character. They are to be regarded as men as well as property. They are called "persons" in the Constitution itself. The representation in Congress is regulated upon the hypothesis that they are persons. They are called property for the purpose of taxation, and nothing is more clear than that as the Constitution stands they are to be considered as property, provided they are made such by the laws of the States in which that population may be found. But does that prevent the Congress of the United States from calling them to their aid? Why? In the character of persons they are clearly liable to the power. Nobody can doubt that. Though not citizens, they are men bound to allegiance to the United States, and receiving from day to day all the protection that the United States promised them. What that is it is immaterial to inquire; but whatever they have and can have of protection under the Constitution of the United States, they have; and, as an equivalent for the allegiance which they owe because of the protection they have, they are bound, when legitimately called upon, to support the Government, either to put down insurrection or to repel invasion.

There is a limitation, Mr. President. I am not prepared to say that, as against that limitation, the legislation of Congress has not gone a step too far, or perhaps whether Congress has not disregarded it altogether, and whether the President, in the execution of the particular power, has not disregarded it. Those persons being property in the several States in which the institution of slavery exists, if they are taken, according to my judgment—but different opinions are entertained, I know; and I am equally sure they are honestly entertained—they must be paid for; but that is the only limitation. The Government of the United States has a right to appropriate individual property for public use, with no other limitation than that of making compensation. The compensation made, the private property becomes public property disengaged of the contracts under which it may have been held by the private citizen. If, therefore, the United States call upon these slave men to act as soldiers in the armies of the United States, and pay the owner, that of itself—and it would be most dishonorable to the United States if it were otherwise—emancipates the slave. It would be a reproach, a blasting reproach, even more acute and bitter than that which the learned Senator's resolution assumes in the case to which the resolution refers, if the United States should use these men for the purpose of putting down this insurrection and maintaining the Government in its existence and restoring it to its power, and were then to permit them to be used as slaves thereafter; and I therefore individually have never had a doubt that whenever these slaves are called into the service of the United States, either into its armies or into its navies, and render the service, they are, by the fact of the service, free; and once free, thank God, they can never again be made slaves.

Mr. President, a word or two more, and I shall have done. Having all proper confidence in the honesty of the President of the United States—if it may not even be considered as disrespectful to him to assert that he is honest; he cannot well be otherwise—I have said that I doubted exceedingly, and that doubt has not been removed, his authority to issue the proclamation declaring the freedom of slaves throughout the rebellious States named in the proclamation. I doubt the authority; and I would not have adopted the policy which he has adopted, because I thought it would be, and I think it has been, productive of no practical good result. Slaves that may be brought within the power of the United States by its armies are free, not under the proclamation, but by laws paramount to the proclamation. The slaves who may not have been within the scope of the military power of the United States, and may not be found within that scope at the period when the Union may be restored to its original condition, will not be made free, in my judgment, by virtue of that proclamation; and the President of the United States in his recent message, and in his declaration of amnesty with which the message concludes, seems rather to be of that opinion, or rather he states hypothetically that it may turn out after all that his proclamation was of no avail; and he, therefore, and as I think very properly—I would have gone to a greater extent than he has done; it is not necessary in this connection to state to what extent I would have gone—has stated in his proclamation of amnesty that the question of the effect of the acts of Congress of confiscation, and the effect of the acts Congress has passed in relation to the institution of slavery and the use of slaves in the armies and navies of the United States, and the effect of his own proclamations in the past and in the present, is to be left finally, at last, first to such legislation as Congress may hereafter think proper to adopt, and secondly to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Sir, it may not be amiss, in the condition in which we find the country, to say—and the letters to which I refer are now in the possession of the President, placed there by myself—that I have two letters from two of the largest slaveholders in the State of Mississippi, men holding from a thousand to two thousand slaves, making a clear income of some one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars, written with solicitude, begging me to see the President upon the subject, in which they have stated substantially, both agreeing in the statement, that Mississippi—that State which its once favored son has so ruined, to every house in which he has brought calamity unspeakable, upon every foot of whose soil he has brought desolation—would return by a very large majority to the Union if that proclamation could be suspended, could be recalled, could be modified, and that she would agree, by the same overwhelming vote, to pass a law for the prospective and gradual abolition of slavery within her limits. Sir, the people have grown wiser than they were before. The opinion of one is offered, as I am upon that subject, and entitled to no particular weight; but I have some little pride in remembering that when I had before the honor of a seat in this body, in 1847, when I participated in a debate relating to this very subject of slavery, I stated what I had ever believed from the time I was able to read and to think—that it was an institution which could not be defended, if the question was whether it should be introduced among us, either upon moral or Christian grounds, and still less upon economical grounds. It is the dearest labor known, certainly in those slaveholding States in which free white labor can be employed.

But, Mr. President, participating as I do in the desire of my friend, the honorable member from Kentucky, that this rebellion should be arrested and the Union restored, much as I question and deny the power of the Congress of the United States, and of course the power of the President, to interfere with slavery in the States, except in the contingencies to which I have adverted, I would see the institution arrested at once, let the country be subjected to all the present calamities which I think would flow from the abolition of the institution in all these States for a time, rather than see this rebellion live an hour longer. I go further, even further than the honorable member from Kentucky. He has stated that deep as is his conviction that the rebellion should be suppressed, that the honor of the nation demands it, that the power and the happiness of the people invoke it, yet he would not like to see it done provided any of the grand securities of liberty—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator from Maryland permit me to correct him?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. He misconceives my position. It was this: I asserted, and I now reiterate it, that sooner than our system of constitutional government and liberty should be overthrown permanently by the usurpations of the Executive, I would rather risk a separation, or any other event.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the honorable member differently. I understood the honorable member as saying, speaking with reference to the actions of the Executive and of Congress, which he designated—and I am not prepared to say that he designated them improperly—as in some respects unconstitutional and destructive of liberty for a time, that he would not submit to them; he would rather let rebellion go on. I stand corrected. I was about to say, Mr. President, that I would see them suspended during the whole of this rebellion if I believed their suspension was necessary to bring about the destruction of the rebellion and the restoration of the Union. The honorable member agrees with me. I know, we all know, I have reason to know it more particularly in my own State, that some acts are being done by the Executive, or under the apparent protection of the Executive, to my mind exceedingly objectionable, because exceedingly tyrannical; but upon that account I shall not raise my voice in this Chamber or my arm elsewhere for the purpose of weakening the powers of the Government in the accomplishment of the great end that we all have at heart, the suppression of the rebellion. The time will come, that end accomplished, when the Constitution will be returned to us in all its original excellence, and the men who have thought proper, without necessity, to violate it, will be called upon to account for such violation; but until that time does come I pray to God that we may with one heart and one voice unite in planting the whole physical and moral power of the Government to put an end now and forever to this embarrassing, unprovoked, unreasonable attempt to destroy this Government, the freest and happiest ever vouchsafed to man, and, by destroying it, perhaps to destroy forever constitutional liberty itself.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, do I understand that the honorable Senator from Maryland assumes as a principle of our Government that the preamble to the Constitution establishes and confers any power upon the Government? That question has been expressly before the Supreme Court of the United States, and it has received this interpretation, that the preamble neither creates nor confers any power whatever, but only points to the ends for which the powers that are vested by the body of the Constitution itself are to be executed. The honorable Senator, I presume, will not deny that that principle has been so announced by the Supreme Court. [Mr. JOHNSON nodded assent.] The honorable Senator adverted to the difference between great men and statesmen on the question of the powers vested in the executive department, and that difference, if I recollect aright, first sprang up in a series of published papers between Messrs. Hamilton and Madison, over the signatures of Helvidius and Pacificus, and that are appended to the ordinary editions of the Federalist; Hamilton maintaining that a general, indefinite executive power was vested by the Constitution of the United States in the President. Mr. Madison contended that it was only the executive power that was named and established by the Constitution which was vested in the President. Do I understand the honorable Senator from Maryland that he takes the position of Mr. Hamilton in relation to that mooted question?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I propound this further question to the honorable Senator: is it not the right, is it not the business and duty of every intelligent man in the United States to know the principles and powers of his Government, and how those principles and powers are divided, and to what departments and officers they are assigned, how much and what powers vested in all and each one? Then I ask him, with his assent to the position of Mr. Hamilton, to inform me and the people how and where we can learn the number, nature, and extent of the powers of the President. He refers to this language of the Constitution, "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and argues that this language imports a more extensive investment of power than is conferred by the Constitution on Congress, as the language used for the latter purpose is, "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in Congress," &c. "The executive power" cannot mean all the executive powers of all the Governments, free, limited, and despotic, of the whole world, ancient and modern. According to the Senator's principle, I ask him if it is the executive power of the Grand Seigneur, or of the Czar of Russia, of the Emperor of Austria, or of the then King of France, of George III, or of the republic of Switzerland, or of all combined, that our Constitution vests in the President? The words, "the executive power," clearly, to my mind, point to some certain and definite executive power. The great men who formed our Constitution, so full of experience and wisdom, would never have established as broad and illimitable, or as vague and indefinite a power, as that contended for by the Senator. The language, "the executive power," to my mind, clearly points to some particular and defined executive power; otherwise in a Government of limited powers generally, and in which those vested in the other departments are limited by particular enumeration, the powers vested in the chief executive officer would be unlimited. "The executive power" refers to and means that to be established by the Constitution, also by enumeration. It comprehends that amount of and those executive powers; and that it means nothing more is further confirmed by the provision that—

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

And this position is further confirmed by the tenth amendment, in these words:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The oppressions of the American colonies were principally from the king; and the idea that soon after their long struggle against an enormous executive power, the great men who framed our Constitution should clothe our Executive with general, undefined, and unlimited executive power seems to me to be utterly preposterous.

Mr. President, I dissent wholly from the positions of the honorable Senator from Maryland. I avow that all the powers of the United States Government are conferred by its Constitution, and that there are no powers vested in that Government, or in any of its departments or officers, except such as are conferred by the language of that Constitution. The Supreme Court have asserted that principle in more than a score of cases. It was the principle of Hamilton, and Madison, and Jay, and the men who formed the Constitution, and whose triumphant vindication of its principles and provisions to give liberty, security, and self-government to the American people, induced its adoption by the conventions of the several States. I maintain, with all due respect to the ability and fame of the honorable Senator, that his principle in relation to that power is eminently heretical and dangerous, and was so pronounced by Mr. Madison, who was said to be the Father of the Constitution.

There is a difference between us toto calo in relation to other points and principles adverted to by the honorable Senator; and I will now state one of them: the power of declaring war in Great Britain, and in the despotic Governments of Europe, is an executive power. In our Government it is legislative, and vested expressly in Congress, and the Executive in no degree shares it with Congress. In England, the power to support armies is a legislative power; but to raise armies is an executive power. In our country, both are changed to legislative powers, expressly vested in Congress; and the President has no right to touch them, and he cannot without usurpation.

The power to recognize a state of case where the execution of the laws is resisted to such a degree as to require the interposition of military force, the power to suppress an insurrection, and the power to repel an invasion, and to determine when each and all those states of case arise, is vested, by the language of the Constitution, in Congress; and therefore the President is excluded from them. The well-known case of Luther vs. Borden, which arose in Rhode Island under the Dorr constitution, decides expressly in relation to two of these points in the paragraphs of the report from which I read, and which seem for the occasion to have escaped the attention of the honorable Senator. The court in that case decide expressly that the President has no right, by the Constitution, nor until he is authorized by the law of Congress to do so, to declare that there is domestic violence in a State. It says expressly that the decision of those questions is rendered political by the Constitution, and they are referred to the political power of the Government, to wit, Congress; and that Congress alone can recognize and make provision for such a condition of the country. These powers are analogous to the power to declare war, and therefore were they also vested in Congress. The court decided further, that Congress, if it had chosen to do so, could have vested this discretion of recognizing such a state of case, and putting the troops in motion to meet it, in the courts as well as in the President; but, by the act of 1795, the court says Congress expressly vested that power in the President, and had acted wisely.

Now, sir, I say that my position on this question of difference between the honorable Senator and myself is fortified by the decisions of the Supreme Court; that his positions are met, refuted, overthrown by the decisions of that court. What power, then, has the President over the subject? When the forces are ordered into the field by Congress, he has simply the power of commander-in-chief, and has no more power in the premises than if the Constitution had declared that the senior general in the United States Army should be commander-in-chief; and I defy the honorable Senator or any other gentleman to refute that proposition.

Then the honorable Senator assumes another position, which is, in my judgment, heretical and eminently dangerous. The power to declare war, to raise and support armies, to call out the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, being vested by the Constitution in Congress, the Senator assumes that if Congress was to neglect or refuse to exercise these necessary powers, the President himself might assume their execution. In my judgment, a more unsound and a more dangerous position was never taken by an American Senator or statesman. It is true that that neglect or refusal of Congress to do its duty would bring the Government to a dead-lock or its dissolution. In like manner, if the judiciary department was to refuse to perform its duties and its functions, under the Constitution, the Government would also be brought to its dissolution. If the President was to refuse to perform his duties, so likewise would the Government be brought to a dissolution. But the theory and structure of our Government is upon the principle that the great functionaries who fill those high offices would execute their trusts. If they fail to do so, though it might produce temporary confusion, there is a power behind them all, to reform the threatened anarchy, and to put the great machine of State again in motion; and that is the people of the United States and the State governments.

But the Senator argues that the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. That is true, but it is by the officers and means which Congress may organize, and not by any that he may devise. I never heard it contended before that this provision of the Constitution conferred powers on the President, and especially the great powers deduced from it by the Senator from Maryland, or the power to organize any measures to put down an insurrection, or execute the resisted laws of the Union.

There is no man more familiar with the decisions of our Supreme Court, or more competent to understand them, than the honorable Senator from Maryland. I appeal to him, if the Supreme Court have not decided this principle in relation to the Constitution: that all the language and every provision of that instrument is to be understood and construed according to the meaning and purpose of those who made it, and that, in giving construction to it, it is the duty of the statesman and the judge to throw himself back into the circumstances and condition of the men who made the Constitution, and to construe it from that standpoint, according to the circumstances that then existed and upon which they framed that instrument, and to take the meaning and import of its language as its framers understood it. With this general rule of construction, will the member from Maryland announce in this Chamber that the Constitution and the executive powers conferred by it on the President were understood by the members of the Convention who formed it as he has deduced and announced them upon the present occasion? Will any man throw himself back to the condition and circumstances in which those great statesmen and legislators were, and maintain the powers assumed by the Senator for the President?

I have argued against the expediency, the policy, and the power both of the Executive and of Congress to incorporate negroes into the United States Army as a part of it.

Proceeding upon the principle which I have thus stated, that in giving interpretation to the Constitution we must throw ourselves back to the age in which it was made, to the condition of the country at that time, and to the circumstances in which those who made it were acting, I ask the honorable Senator now, whether, adopting that mode of interpretation, he can candidly come to the conclusion that the framers of the Constitution ever intended that negro slaves should be a part of the militia or military force of the United States? No, sir; no. If such a proposition had been made in that illustrious convocation of statesmen and patriots, it would have been rejected, or, if not rejected, it would have defeated at once and forever all attempts to frame a Constitution for the United States.

The Senator speaks of his desire to strengthen the executive arm of the Government in this rebellion. He has no deeper or more sincere desire to that effect than I have; but I tell him that, according to my humble judgment, the strength and power of this Government is not in the provisions of its Constitution alone, but in the protection, the security, the liberties, privileges, and rights, which it guarantees to the American people, and the fidelity with which it is administered by all men engaged in its administration, whether in the legislative or executive department. Its greatest strength is in the love and confidence of the people. Sir, if you want to strengthen the Government, or if the Government desires to strengthen itself, it must adhere to the law of its creation, the Constitution; it must exercise its powers within the pale of that instrument; it must respect its compromises, its prohibitions of power; and just in proportion as it transcends these great principles, it will become weak and strengthen the rebellion.

Sir, I have no more doubt now, that if Mr. Lincoln and the Administration had, in good faith and with firmness and consistency of purpose, adhered strictly to the Crittenden resolution which passed this body almost unanimously, and I think passed the House of Representatives, on the motion of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who was then in the House, unanimously, and the two principal departments of the Government had been so administered, the rebellion would have been put down long, long ago. It is by the departure of the Executive and of Congress from the great principles of the Constitution that the unity of the American people has been destroyed. It is in this mode that the Government itself has been weakened and the enemy strengthened. The way to regain the lost strength which existed in the unity of the people at the commencement of the rebellion, is to compel the Executive to retrace his steps and to assume a constitutional basis in carrying on the war.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that the present party in power know that its gigantic power has resulted from this war, and the extreme odium in which the rebellion is justly held by the masses of the American people, and by none more than myself. The unparalleled patronage which the war has given to the Administration, and the power that it has over the Army, which enables it to establish a practical military despotism wherever it may choose, and extended it in the Senator's own State, in Delaware, in a part of my State, and in some parts of the State of Missouri, at their elections, are the fruits of this war. Mr. Hamilton himself says, in his immortal numbers in the Federalist, that it is a law of executive power to encroach continually upon the power of the legislative branch of the Government and upon the rights of the people; that it is an inherent law of executive power, in time of war, greatly to augment and enhance itself. We have deplorably experienced that truth.

The administration of the executive department is as deeply impressed with these truths as was Mr. Hamilton. It knows, and all intelligent gentlemen know, that if the war had been brought to an end twelve months ago abolitionism would have collapsed; the Union would have been restored as it was; the power of the Constitution would have again become dominant, and the laws would have been executed to our utmost confines. The party in power knows that this war and all its vast patronage is necessary to its continuance in power and to the election of its nominees for the next Presidency and Vice Presidency; and it is determined that this war shall continue until the presidential election.

Sir, this war could have been brought to a close long, long ago. If the Administration had been singly and in good faith devoted to the principles announced in the Crittenden resolution; if they had not selected commanders because of their hostility, not to rebellion, but to slavery; if they had selected them for their military capacity, and their ability to put down the rebellion, instead of their hostility to slavery and their willingness to be used for its overthrow regardless of the constitutional prohibitions; if able commanders had been selected irrespective of that, and the President and his Cabinet and General-in-Chief had sustained them steadily and constantly in the field, and sent to them sufficient forces, the insurrection would have been put down early, and the Union would have been speedily restored. That committee, which Wendell Phillips said was sitting at the other end of the avenue to regulate the next presidential campaign, knows the truth of all the propositions which I have stated. It is working with a view to their truth and their operation upon the public mind. If the question was put to-day to some honorable Senators in this Hall, which would you prefer, that the union of the States with slavery in them, as they existed before, subject only to the abrasions of the war, should be restored, or that the southern confederacy should become permanently separate and independent? I believe many of them would accept the latter proposition.

I believe it is that the war may destroy slavery utterly that the Administration has caused this war to languish and to be inefficiently prosecuted, and with a full determination that it shall run into the next presidential election, to enable them to control that important event, upon which hangs the fate and the destinies of this country, and by patronage or by the intervention of military power to appoint the electors for the Presidency and Vice Presidency in the various States, and thus secure their continuance in power. In the honorable Senator's zeal to support this war, is he in favor of the policy which I have just stated? If he is, I am not. I want every freeman in America, with all the fervor of his heart, and all the strength of his arm, to resist such an election of President as that of Louis Napoleon in France. I declare that in war and in peace the freemen of America should have the right of free speech, a free press, and free election by which to canvass the acts of the Administration, of the legislative or the executive department, by which to inform the public mind, and to bring the peaceful but conquering numbers to the polls to reform all the abuses of the Government.

Sir, when those great rights are put down, revolution is an accomplished fact. We may maintain the forms of free government, but its rights and liberties are as completely gone as when Augustus declared himself emperor and perpetual tribune of Rome, and placed himself at the head of all the forces of that mighty empire, just then passing into the state of an imperial military despotism.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we are on the eve of such a change; that the Administration are doing their utmost to hasten it and to secure it for their own advantage; that if the people would maintain the Constitution and the liberties for which our fathers fought through seven years of blood, they must arouse themselves from their lethargy, and they must show that while they have the mind and courage and will and fortitude to put down secessionism and rebellion, they have also the same great qualities to prevent the President of the United States and his Cabinet from usurping, permanently at least, despotic military power.

One word more to the honorable Senator from Maryland, and I have done. Franklin said, in the Revolutionary war, that a nation that would sacrifice essential liberty for temporary advantage would shortly have neither. I believe in the truth, and the permanent truth, of that political maxim. I am against such a sacrifice, not only permanently or for the continuance of the war, but even for a day or an hour. As a woman, when she yields her virtue once, loses it forever, so the people who consent to the sacrifice of their liberties, their Constitution, and all the rights it secures to them, for temporary advantage, will never regain what they thus lose.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, nothing on earth was further from my intention or my expectation when I came into the Senate Chamber to-day than to take part in this debate. I do not now intend to trespass long on the attention of the Senate; but a statement has been made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky that I never will hear anywhere without entering my indignant denial of it; and that is, that the party in power and its representatives on this floor do not desire peace, but desire a continuation of this war to influence the next presidential election. A more atrocious allegation against honorable men I think I never listened to from the beginning of time to the present moment.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable gentleman will permit me one moment, I heard him make a much more atrocious allegation than that within the last two years, when he avowed that the army of plunderers that were marching upon the Treasury under this administration of the Government exceeded the number of soldiers in the field.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator ever heard me make such a statement as that, I will admit it; but I never made such a remark, or anything like it.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Globe will prove it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator cannot show that I ever made any such remark, or anything like it; but I will tell him what I did say, and what I will repeat. I said I thought the liberties of the country were more in danger from the profligacy that was practiced upon the Treasury than they were from the rebels in the field.

Now, to return to the subject: if the allegation of the honorable Senator be true, I would sooner take the hand of a man from a charnel-house, covered with pestilence, than that of one of the honorable gentlemen around me. If that allegation be true, every Senator upon this floor that supports this Administration is stamped with the foulest treason and perjury that human nature can be guilty of.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I do not wish to be interrupted. The country is at war. The tremendous issues of national life and death tremble in the balance. Treason, with its red right hand, aims a fell blow at the national life. The destinies of the country are committed to the honorable gentlemen who surround me, who are bound by every obligation that can bind honorable men, and by the sanctions of an oath, to sustain their country and their Constitution, and to defend the firesides and homes that are threatened with invasion by lawless traitors. But the Senator from Kentucky tells them they are hypocrites; that they do not desire the termination of this war.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not allude to any one in the Senate. I said "this Administration."

Mr. HALE. "The party in power." This is the party in power. It is true the Senator made no direct personal application to any Senator, but it is an allegation which embraces every one of us; and the allegation is that of all the men that disgrace God's footstool, of all the criminals that fill the penitentiaries, there are none so base, none so worthy of the detestation and scorn of men and the judgments of God, as these Senators who sit here, members of this dominant party. Their country is at stake. God, in His providence, is trying now an experiment, the great question of ages, the question of free government for the world; and, in the progress of events and the course of His providence, the destinies of this country and of this war to no inconsiderable degree are intrusted to the men who surround me; and, sir, are we to sit here and silently hear a member of this body, before the country, before the world, before heaven and earth, bring such allegations against us that, if true, every inmate of the penitentiaries might scorn to give us the hand of friendly recognition? Hypocrisy such as this which has been charged upon us can hardly be delineated in fitting terms and character; and yet in that the President of the United States, by express designation, is also implicated.

Now, sir, let me say a word in regard to that. I am not a eulogist of the President, nor of hardly anybody else; but I believe if there may be one thing said of Mr. Lincoln to which almost everybody will assent, it is that he is eminently an honest and patriotic man. I confess that to-day is the first time in my whole life that I ever heard the honesty and the patriotism of Mr. Lincoln questioned. I have congratulated my fellow-citizens, when, in my poor and feeble way, it has been my lot to address them, that in one thing the country, in this terrible emergency, was eminently fortunate, and that was, in the personal character of the Chief Magistrate; that he was a man of such integrity that it spoke not only to his friends, but extorted the unwilling concession of his enemies; and that, amidst all the vituperation of political calumny, the personal integrity and patriotism of the President, thus far, had stood unscathed and unquestioned.

Sir, I apprehend the honorable Senator from Kentucky did not appreciate the character of the accusation which he brought against those who surrounded him. I have seen him, I have met him tendering the courtesies of social intercourse to men who are not worthy to unloose his shoe-latchets, if they be what he tells them they are to-day. They are the vilest hypocrites that the world bears up. They are the foulest traitors that ever the sun of heaven shone on.

Why, sir, what are we to-day, and what is our condition? It seems to me that in the purposes of Providence we occupy the climacteric position between the eternities of the past and the future. We have to settle for ourselves, for all posterity, for all coming time, the great question whether liberty upon the whole be a boon desirable for humanity, and whether man is capable of self-government. The hopes, the sympathies, the fears of the world look upon us. Who is it that can strike an effective blow against his country equal to him who loosens in the public mind all confidence in the integrity, the patriotism, and the honesty of those to whom the public destinies are intrusted? No, sir; that allegation ought not to be listened to for a single moment without an indignant denial from every man who feels that it is, to say the least, cruel and unjust. I know the Senator from Kentucky has such a habitual flow of words that he cannot stop, and sometimes he lets out words without carefully measuring the idea that follows them, and it must have been something of that sort which influenced him when he made the declaration that he uttered here to-day.

I have not heard all the discussion; I do not know what are the merits of the particular propositions upon which the Senator has commented; I have not had the pleasure of listening to them; but in this connection I will say this: if the Government of the United States have called upon black soldiers, have taken them into their armies, and carried them out to fight the battles of the country, they are bound to protect them at all hazards by every agency they can put forth; and if the Government, having done that, and having used them, and they having become prisoners, abandon them to their fate, they would be guilty of a baseness unparalleled in history. What do we want? Do we want to look carefully at the complexion, the race, or the color of those who fight the battles of the country? I apprehend not; but let that question be as it may, when the Government take a soldier, put their uniform on him and send him out to battle, they are bound by every consideration which can rest upon a Christian Government to protect him at all events and at all hazards; and by no questions of expediency, by no questions of the effects which are to result from this plain, undeniable, palpable duty, are they to be deterred from doing what they ought.

Having said this much, I shall leave the subject; but I confess, before I sit down, that I was not a little astonished to hear this charge so deliberately, apparently, made against the Government, against the Administration, and against the Senate. I believe that the party in power, with Mr. Lincoln at its head, has but one aim, and that aim is the welfare of the country. I believe that he has but one purpose, and that is the salvation of his country. I believe that those who are associated with him are, in this respect, in full union and sympathy with him.

The idea that these men, that this party, that this Senate, could desire a continuation of this cruel, this ferocious, this bloody war; that our ears are not yet sufficiently filled with the wail of mourners; that the desolation of domestic hearthstones is not universal enough to satisfy our ferocious spirit; that we are willing that our young men shall be given to slaughter, our widows to mourning, and our orphans to destitution, for some paltry political advantage to be gained at the next presidential election, is an insinuation so base that I can only wonder that by any accident it found its way into the fertile brain of the Senator from Kentucky. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Order!

Mr. HALE. The country is at war—such a war as the world has never seen. The country is engaged in a war in which all the elements of civil liberty that have been gained in the progress of all the bloody centuries of the past are at stake; and at this time, when the question is nothing more nor less than life or death to the nation, to believe that a set of men, "the party in power," can be so utterly base, so reckless to everything that should bind them—nay, that they should be so callous to the grief and the woe that is already over the land, that they should be so deaf to the pleadings of humanity, to the mournings of a desolated land, as to desire, for some paltry political end, the continuation of such a scene of woe, is a picture too revolting for the contemplation of a civilized people.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, without any purpose or desire to enter into this debate, I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky the name of the major general in the Army of the United States to whom he referred. I understood my distinguished friend the Senator from Kentucky to say that a major general commanding in the armies of the United States had said that it was the purpose of the President to retain his power, even though an election should go against him, by the Army of the United States. If that be true, the Administration does not deserve the confidence of the country. If it be false, the informer should be mustered out of the service of the United States, as unworthy of the commission he bears. If there is no indelicacy or impropriety in the question, I should like to know the name of the officer.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I reply to the honorable Senator from Indiana. This was my statement: that a gentleman who had formerly been a member of the other House told me that a major general now in the service of the United States had said to him, if Mr. Lincoln was defeated at the next presidential election, he would not surrender the office, but would hold on to it. Now, I tell the honorable Senator that if he will come to me in the strictest confidence of a man of honor, as I know he is, I will give the names both of the general and of my informant.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, I have only this to say, that it seems to me any commanding officer who makes any such statement is unworthy the service of the Government, if that statement be false; if it be true, the Government is unworthy of the support of the people; and for the Government, as one of the humblest supporters of that Government, I deny that any such purpose or allegation has ever been made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, in compliance with the requirements of the sixteenth and eighteenth sections of the act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States, approved August 18, 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, recommending that Captain John Rodgers, of the Navy, receive a vote of thanks from Congress for the eminent skill and gallantry exhibited by him in the engagement with the rebel armed iron-clad steamer Fingal, alias Atlanta, while he was in command of the United States iron-clad steamer Weehawken, and also for his zeal, bravery, and general good conduct on many occasions. This recommendation is made in compliance with the ninth section of the act of July 16, 1862, which enacts that any line officer of the Navy or Marine corps may be advanced one grade, if, upon the recommendation of the President by name, he receives the thanks of Congress for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, or for extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession.

The message was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several messages of an executive character were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time engaged therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the committee on rules, and desires to state that the reason why his name appears first on the committee is because the House so ordered it, and not of his own volition.

The committee is as follows: The SPEAKER, Messrs. WASHBURN of Illinois, MALLORY, LITTLEJOHN, and COX.

VOTE OF THANKS TO CAPTAIN RODGERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In conformity to the law of the 16th July, 1862, I most cordially recommend that Captain John Rodgers, United States Navy, receive a vote of thanks from Congress for the eminent skill and gallantry exhibited by him in the engagement with the rebel armed iron-clad steamer Fingal, alias Atlanta, while in command of the United States iron-clad steamer Weehawken, which led to her capture on the 17th June, 1863, and also for the zeal, bravery, and general good conduct shown by this officer on many occasions. This recommendation is specially made in order to comply with the requirements of the ninth section of the aforesaid act, which is in the following words, namely:

"That any line officer of the Navy or Marine corps may be advanced one grade, if, upon recommendation of the President by name, he receives the thanks of Congress for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, or for extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 8, 1863.

The message was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report dated 9th instant, with the accompanying papers received from the Secretary of State, in compliance with the requirements of the sixteenth and eighteenth sections of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House letters from the Superintendent of Public Printing, submitting estimates of additional appropriations for public printing, binding, &c., for the year ending June 30, 1864; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS COTTMAN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds on his table a communication dated "Washington city," signed by J. L. Riddell, not as Governor, but as Governor elect, of Louisiana, transmitting the resignation of Thomas Cottman as member of Congress. The Chair does not see the name of Thomas Cottman on the list of members.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the communication be not received.

Mr. COX. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not submit the paper. He merely presents it for the information of the House.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee of Elections.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1865; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS also, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS also, from the same committee, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session, together with the accompanying documents, as relates to the finances, to the deficiencies in the revenues of the Post Office Department, to the receipts into the Treasury, and public expenditures, the organization of banking institutions, and provision for a uniform currency, to the provision of additional revenue, to taxing consuls residing abroad, and the ways and means for supporting and meeting all public liabilities of the Government, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to commerce be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the public domain be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of telegraphs, and to the Post Office Department, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and judicial proceedings, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the public expenditures be referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to agriculture and the Department of Agriculture be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to our intercourse with the Indian tribes and to remodeling the whole Indian system, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Army of the United States, the exchange of prisoners, to additional provisions for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and to coast and lake defenses, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Navy of the United States be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to our foreign affairs, together with the accompanying correspondence in relation thereto, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Territories of the United States be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to pensions and the Pension Bureau be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the expenditures in connection with the State Department be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to expenditures in connection with the Treasury Department be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to expenditures in connection with the War Department be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to expenditures in connection with the Navy Department be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the expenditures in connection with the Post Office Department be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the militia be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to a Pacific railroad be referred to a special committee of thirteen, to be appointed by the Speaker, to which committee all documents and resolutions in relation to Pacific railroads shall be referred.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to roads and canals be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to any arrangement for the freed people be referred to the select committee of nine ordered by the House on the 14th instant.

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as is contained in the proclamation, and as refers to the condition and treatment of the rebellious States, be referred to a special committee of nine, to be appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. COX. I have an amendment to offer to those resolutions.

The SPEAKER. They will be open to amendment unless the previous question be moved.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not design to interfere with the right of the gentleman from Ohio, but I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, which, I am sure, he will allow me to do.

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he will accept as a substitute for the last resolution an amendment which points more directly to the purpose that he has in view.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That so much of the President's message as relates to the duty of the United States to guaranty a republican form of government to the States in which the governments recognized by the United States have been abrogated or overthrown, be referred to a select committee of nine, to be named by the Speaker; which shall report the bills necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing guarantee.

Mr. STEVENS. Although I cannot accept the amendment, on account of reporting the resolutions from a committee, if the gentleman moves it as a substitute I shall not object to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I offer it as a substitute for the last resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the two propositions look to two distinct things, and I see no reason why both cannot be entertained. The resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means contemplates one thing; that of the gentleman from Maryland another. One committee is to take cognizance of one matter, and the other committee of a totally distinct matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the amendment is germane to the original resolution. The one refers to the condition and treatment of the rebel States; the other refers to the fact that the governments recognized by the Government of the United States have been abrogated or overthrown. The verbiage is different, but the Chair thinks that the subject-matter is the same.

Mr. BROOKS. The essential difference between the two propositions I take to be this: the first proposition leaves it to the discretion of the committee to take what action it may deem proper. It is optional to it to report a bill or not. If it find that a republican form of government does not exist in some of the States, it may report the necessary bill. The substitute, as I understand it, proposes special instructions that this committee shall report some bill. I do not know what object the gentleman from Maryland has in view. I shall be happy to hear from him, and will give way to him for an explanation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The object which I had in view in submitting the resolution as a substitute for that proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means was simply this: the language of the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is very general, and perhaps does not point precisely to the object the gentleman who drew it had in his own mind. It would cover the whole subject of the war. So much, I think it says in substance, of the President's message as relates to the condition and treatment of the rebel States shall be referred to a select committee. What does not relate to the condition and treatment of the rebel States? It includes the conduct of the war; the treatment of the people not in arms in the rebellious districts, and the policy the military governors shall pursue; it includes, in a word, the whole treatment of the States which are the theater of the rebellion.

I take it that that was not what the Committee of Ways and Means contemplated. I presume they intended to point to what, in the very inaccurate phraseology of the day, is known as the question of reconstruction.

Now, as I think there has been no destruction of the Union, no breaking up of the Government, I carefully avoid the use of any such word. The fact, as well as the constitutional view of the condition of affairs in the States enveloped by the rebellion, is that a force has overthrown, or the people, in a moment of madness, have abrogated the governments which existed in those States, under the Constitution, and were recognized by the United States prior to the breaking out of the rebellion.

The Government of the United States is engaged in two operations. One is the suppression of armed resistance to the supreme authority of the United States, and which is endeavoring to suppress that opposition by arms. Another—a very delicate and perhaps as high a duty—is to see, when armed resistance shall be removed, that governments shall be restored in those States republican in their form.

The substitute that I offer points the investigation of the committee to that one point, using carefully the language of the Constitution throughout—"that so much of the President's message as relates to the duty of the United States to guaranty republican forms of government in those States in which governments recognized previously by the United States have been abrogated or overturned, be referred to a select committee, whose duty it shall be to report such bills as are necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing guarantees." It is not intended, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] apparently supposes, as a peremptory instruction to the committee to report any particular measure. There is no measure which has been indicated that the resolution proposes they shall report; nor are they instructed necessarily to report any bill; but it is taken for granted, when a matter of that kind within the legitimate sphere of the legislation of Congress is referred to a committee, they will report such measures relative to the subject as their wisdom shall dictate. That is all that is contemplated by this resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. As I now understand the gentleman from Maryland—so far as I do understand him—I am much more disposed to follow the lead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who introduced the original resolution, rather than the lead of the gentleman from Maryland. I think his formula is a better one. In this particular condition of the House, I am opposed to the construction of a special committee

But if the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland shall be persisted in, I should be disposed to add that this committee be instructed to inquire also whether republican governments have not been abrogated and overturned north of the Potomac as well as south of the Potomac since this revolution began.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not disposed, however, to enter into any controversy on this subject at this early period of the session; but I repeat that it seems wiser for us at this point and at this hour to follow the lead of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and leave the whole broad subject untrammelled to the investigation of that committee on the principles he stated, rather than to instruct, or seem to instruct by the use of the word "shall," the committee to report any series of measures.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that this subject is to be discussed, but I think that we ought to congratulate ourselves that, despite the effort of certain individuals, there is fortunately a republican government in the States north of the Potomac, and that there likely will continue to be without infringement or abatement. I think that the gentleman from New York can set his heart at ease on that point, it having been settled by the recent elections.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that this is the point to take our departure one way or the other; still, so far as I have heard the debate, I shall follow the lead of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] unless I take it myself. [Laughter.] At any rate, I shall follow the principles indicated by his resolution, and the remarks with which he has accompanied it. I do not believe, strictly speaking, that there are any rebel States; I know that there are States which rebels have taken possession of and overthrown the legitimate governments for the time being; and I hold, with the gentleman from Maryland, as I understood him, that those governments still remain; and that as soon as we can get possession of them we will breathe into them the spirit of republican life—a free soul once again. I am for the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was. [Laughter.] Yes, I am for the Constitution as it is, and not as it has been falsely interpreted, and for the Union as it was before it was taken possession of by slaveholding tyrants, as the steamer Chesapeake recently has been by pirates. I want to dispossess the ship of State of her piratical crew, and to put in their place loyal men, to sail her as our forefathers sailed the old Union. That is what I want.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Are the resolutions open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to move an additional resolution when the call for the previous question has been voted down.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to call for the previous question on a single resolution or amendment. The previous question has not yet been called for.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will now move my additional resolution.

Mr. COX. I have a chance at that first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio indicated a like intent.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman seems to be behindhand this morning.

Mr. COX. I yielded to the gentleman from Maryland out of courtesy.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, and on a division there were—ayes 80, noes 74.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—91.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Macy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Srouse, Stuart, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—80.

So the amendment was adopted.

During the roll call,

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. BOUTWELL, was absent from the House on account of indisposition.

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that Mr. LITTLEJOHN was still confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. BEAMAN stated that Mr. UPSON was detained from the House by indisposition.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX. I offer the following amendment to come in at the close of the resolutions reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

Resolved, That the seven additional standing committees appointed under rules numbered 103 and 103 b be directed at once to perform the duties prescribed by said rules, and examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the several Departments respectively submitted to them, and report particularly, as specified in rule No. 103, so that the appointment of said committees may not become, as heretofore, nugatory; and further, that, to carry into effect this resolution, the said committees have all the powers of committees of investigation.

I ask for the reading of rule No. 103.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the several Committees on Public Expenditures to inquire whether any offices belonging to the branches or Departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary; and to report, from time to time, on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also, to examine into the pay and emoluments of all offices under the laws of the United States; and to report, from time to time, such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require."

Mr. COX. I demand the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a single moment.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman wishes to make any suggestion, I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to suggest that while probably I should not object to that resolution as an independent proposition—although, perhaps, the latter part of it is hardly proper—yet it does not seem to me to be pertinent to the resolutions distributing the President's message. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it as an amendment. As a separate resolution I should probably have no objection to it.

Mr. COX. If the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] was pertinent at all, then, for a still stronger reason, this would be pertinent. This amendment proposes to instruct the committees to whom are referred parts of the message to act at once and promptly, so that their appointment may be of some force and effect, and it also gives them some additional powers.

Mr. STEVENS. And then it goes on in a censorious manner to say that heretofore these committees have been nugatory. That is what Mr. Benton would have called "a stump speech in the belly of the resolution." I think that had better be left out, and that if the resolution is passed it should be passed as a separate resolution.

Mr. COX. I will strike out the word "nugatory," as it seems to be objectionable to the gentleman. I did not intend really to censure any former committees; but it has been the habit of the House to neglect this business year after year. There has been no time when it has been more important than it is at present to have the standing committees of the House investigate all the accounts of the Departments; and they should have power to send for persons and papers, like committees of investigation, so that we may have some force and effect given to this valuable rule. I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in favor of it. I cannot see that it disturbs his resolutions at all. It really carries out the intention of his resolutions as to these committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the question of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is out of order, as not being consistent with the series of resolutions to distribute certain portions of the President's message. This amendment has nothing whatever to do with that subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order, for when business is sent to a committee the House is competent to instruct that committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The resolution merely instructs the committees named to do their duty.

Mr. COX. Yes; and gives them power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It assumes that these committees would not do their full duty unless specially instructed.

The SPEAKER. When matters are referred to committees it is competent for the House to instruct them.

Mr. COX. I will modify my resolution by striking out the words "so that the appointment of such committees may not become, as heretofore, nugatory."

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will also strike out the concluding part of his resolution. I think it too early to begin to authorize committees to send for persons and papers. If they find obstructions in their way it will be time enough then to give them that authority. We have had experience of the bad effect of this thing. I hope that part of the resolution will be stricken out; and I will have no objection to the rest of it.

Mr. COX. I really think that that is the essence of the resolution. I want to give these committees power to investigate these matters. Let them go to the Departments, lop off these corruptions, if there be any; and if there be none, there is no harm done. Let them have power to investigate these matters fully, not half way. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be in favor of the fullest investigation. These are not to be roving committees.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the proposition is to give these committees authority to send for persons and papers. I have no objection to the fullest examination. If it be necessary for the committees to have this authority, they can come here and ask for it; but I think that at present it is better not to give it.

Mr. COX. I would like to oblige the gentleman from Pennsylvania in that regard, but I would rather withdraw the resolution at once.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I shall be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. COX. I insist on my resolution; and move the previous question on its adoption.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the following as an amendment, and move the previous question on the whole series:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as refers to foreign immigration be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the amendment was agreed to; and the resolutions, as amended, were adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN M. M. HAWS.

Mr. ELIOT asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the papers in the case of Captain M. M. Haws.

MAJOR GENERAL BLUNT'S REPORT.

Mr. BOYD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to Congress, if in his opinion it is compatible with the public interest, a copy of the report of Major General Blunt, filed by Gilpatrick, on the matter of peculating from the Government in the subsistence, clothing, and transporting the refugee Indians.

REPORT OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of the following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. Cox, and laid over under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report made by Major General George B. McClellan concerning the organization and operations of the army of the Potomac while under his command, and of all Army operations while he was commander-in-chief.

Mr. COX moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MASSACHUSETTS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES presented the memorial of George S. Sleeper, contesting the seat in this House of Alexander H. Rice as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the third district of Massachusetts; which, together with all papers on file relating to said contest, was referred to the Committee of Elections.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER. The business in order is the call of the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Illinois.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all public documents of which extra copies have been ordered to be printed for distribution, and which have not been delivered to the persons entitled thereto under the resolution of the last House of Representatives, shall now be delivered by the officer having possession of the same to the Representatives in this House of those districts whose former Representatives have not drawn the documents to which such districts were respectively entitled according to the rate of distribution established.

The resolution was adopted.

CLERK TO DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

Mr. LOVEJOY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be authorized to employ a clerk, with a compensation of four dollars a day, during the time he is actually employed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I will simply say that I am unanimously instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report that resolution, asking for authority to employ a clerk. The committee so instructed me at a meeting held this morning.

The House is already aware that this committee has the entire supervision of the business of this District, local as well as general—the sewerage of the streets, and everything. If members have read the report of the Secretary of the Interior, they will have noticed that there are a great many important subjects of legislation recommended by that officer to be attended to by this House, and which must of course come before it through this committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether it has been usual for this committee to employ a clerk—whether they had authority to employ one in the last Congress?

Mr. LOVEJOY. They have asked for a clerk for several sessions, but it has not been accorded them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor, and the motion is not, therefore, in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The gentleman, I think, is a little hasty. I simply wish to state these facts, and that it is the unanimous request of the committee. There are some members of the present committee who have been members of it heretofore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STEELE] was a member of the committee in the last Congress, and he is decidedly of the opinion that we actually and honestly need a clerk. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw it if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. ASHLEY. I will. I have served on this committee in a former Congress, and, although I am not now a member of it, I desire to say to the House what must be apparent to every gentleman of experience here, that every member of Congress, or at least of this House, ought to have a clerk. [Laughter.] It is impossible for a man to do his business at all here, attend to his committee duties, and answer the letters of his constituents, and much less can a committee of this importance get along without a clerk. The Committee for the District of Columbia ought not to be required to get along without one, and I hope the request of the gentleman from Illinois will at once be granted. In accordance with my promise, I now renew the demand to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The demand for the previous question is pending.

The motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative—ayes 22, noes 85.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. MORRILL. Is this a resolution to increase the number of appointees of the House?

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, Gauson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Loan, Long, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McEugene, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wainey, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Bliss, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Dawson, Denison, English, Finck, Harding, Harrington, Holman, Hutchins, Kernan, Le Blond, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrill, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Radford, Ross, Seafield, Spaulding, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—36.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LOVEJOY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BEAMAN. Is a motion to reconsider a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move, then, to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN,] in reference to the distribution of documents.

Mr. COX. How did the gentleman vote?

The SPEAKER. There was no vote by yeas and nays, and in such a case any member can move to reconsider. Does the gentleman propose to call up the motion to reconsider at this time?

Mr. BEAMAN. Not until the call of the States has been gone through with.

The SPEAKER. It will be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The resolution was read by the Clerk. On a division, there were—ayes 81, noes 23.

Mr. BEAMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid upon the table.

Mr. FRANK. What will be the effect of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot say. It was adopted by the House, and speaks for itself.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker of this House, to whom shall be referred all petitions or other communications having reference to an increase of railway communications and facilities between New York city and Washington, and whose duty it shall be to consider and report upon that subject; and that said committee shall have power to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOKS moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

On a division, there were—ayes 60, noes 57.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Edens, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Marey, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James B. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Scheuck, Seofield, Scott, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, William C. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—91.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Benjamin, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brundage, William G. Brown, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jencks, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Orth, Paterson, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Ross, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Stebbins, Stevens, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William D. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—59.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at twenty minutes past two o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented two petitions of citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of a law emancipating all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRIMES presented the memorial of George W. Riggs, jr., president of the Washington Gas-Light Company, praying for the repeal of that portion of the act of Congress of July 11, 1863, which fixes the price of gas; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HICKS presented a petition of the inspectors of customs for the port of Baltimore, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Samuel L. Linat, praying that he may be allowed the difference between his account rendered for subsisting soldiers in Baltimore, Maryland, and the amount allowed him by the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POMEROY presented papers relating to the naval services of Captain S. B. Bissell, of the United States Navy; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, approving of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories, the emancipation and confiscation acts, the enrollment of slaves in the Army, and the suspension of the habeas corpus; and praying "that those measures may be vigorously enforced, carried forward, and perfected," and that "colored soldiers be placed on the same footing, as to pay and privileges, as the white soldiers," and that none but officers in favor of these measures be appointed to the command of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of Colonels Samuel A. Duncan and J. W. Ames, and fifty-nine other officers of the fourth and sixth regiments United States colored troops, praying for additional legislation relative to the bounty, pay, and allowances of colored troops; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the memorial of Mary Ann Sands, legatee of Joseph Gideon, praying for relief; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of the board of supervisors of Cass county, Michigan, representing "that the provisions of the 'conscript act,' so called, whereby persons liable to do military duty are divided into two classes, the first of which is to be exhausted before the second shall be called out, as also the $300 exemption clause, are unjust," and praying that they be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have been requested to present the petition of Rev. John Pleasanton Du Hamel, rector of St. Thomas's church, Newark, Delaware, praying Congress to amend the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces. The petitioner declares the incompatibility of the ministerial office with that of a soldier, and that the requirement of such service of a minister would be asking him to violate his ordination vows.

In moving the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, which I now do, I wish to state, as my own opinion, that a gentleman circumstanced like the petitioner, who attends to the duties of his holy office by preaching "peace on earth and good will to men," ought to be exempted from the liabilities of that act. That class of preachers who do not confine themselves to the discharge of such duties, but convert their churches into meetings for other purposes, ought, in my judgment, to be placed in the front rank of the Army and made to fight until this war is over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the petition of Berendt A. Froiseth; to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the same. The committee do not think it is advisable to enter upon the practice of printing memorials, and there seems to be no special reason why this should form the first exception to the rule.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 7) to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army, reported it with amendments.

THANKS TO GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant and the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during this rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck, to be presented to Major General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America, to report it back unanimously to the Senate with the recommendation that it pass; and if there be no objection, I ask that it be put on its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs that the thanks of Congress be presented to Major General Ulysses S. Grant, and through him to the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during this rebellion, for their gallantry and good conduct in the battles in which they have been engaged; and requests the President of the United States to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions, to be presented to Major General Grant. When the medal shall have been struck, the President is to cause a copy of the joint resolution to be engrossed on parchment, and to transmit it, together with the medal, to Major General Grant, to be presented to him in the name of the people of the United States of America. A sufficient sum of money to carry this resolution into effect is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the Military Committee whether they have made any examination to ascertain what sum may be necessary to carry the resolution into effect. It is not usual to make an unlimited appropriation in the way here proposed.

Mr. WILSON. The committee did not know what sum it would be necessary to appropriate; and it was thought best by those interested in passing this resolution, or those who took a deep interest in it, to leave the matter to the discretion of the authorities. We do not know what the cost will be; it will be but a very small sum, at any rate; but it is difficult to tell precisely what is fitting for them to do. It is a very small matter, and I think it had better be left to the discretion of the Department.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOINT RULES.

Mr. FOOT. I give notice that to-morrow or on some future day I shall move to amend or modify the first joint rule of the two Houses of Congress, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the first joint rule of the two Houses be amended to read as follows:

When amendments are made by either House to a bill, joint resolution, or concurrent resolution from the other, the course of proceeding shall be as follows:

1. The House originating the bill, &c., may, in whole or in part, agree to such amendments, agree to such amendments with amendments, or disagree to them.

2. The House making the amendments may, in like manner, proceed to act upon these proceedings of the originating House.

3. Should this last action not be agreed to by the originating House, and thereby produce a disagreement between the two Houses, either may recede from its disagreement, thereby passing the bill, &c., or may insist upon it and ask a free conference on the point or points of such disagreement, appoint a committee of conference on its part, and send the bill, papers, &c., to the other House.

4. The latter House may also insist upon its disagreement, agree to the conference, and appoint a committee on its part.

5. The joint committee of conference may then proceed freely to confer upon the point or points of disagreement between the two Houses, but shall not be at liberty to affect any other part or parts of the bill, &c., already agreed to by both Houses; and shall promptly make report of the result of such conference to their respective Houses, the bill, papers, &c., being brought into the House first proposing the conference.

6. This latter House shall first act upon the report of the committee. Its action upon the report shall then be sent, with the bill, papers, &c., to the other House, which may then also act upon it.

7. Should the committees respectively report a disagreement between themselves, second committees may be appointed, who shall proceed in like manner as the first.

8. Should the second committees agree to a common report for settling the disagreement between the two Houses, it will be made to the respective Houses, upon which the Houses will act as stated in the sixth article of this rule.

9. Should the second committees disagree, the fact will be reported to the respective Houses as in the first instance, and the House asking the second conference shall first act upon this second report.

10. The term of conference being then passed, this House may recede from its disagreement, which will pass the bill, &c., or by a simple resolution it may state its reasons and adhere to its disagreement, or it may simply adhere to its disagreement and send the bill, papers, &c., to the other House.

11. The other House may then proceed in the same manner, and should this House recede from its disagreement, the bill, &c., will be passed; but should this House also adhere, with a statement of its reasons or not, the bill, &c., will then be lost.

12. Should a bill, &c., be thus lost or defeated, such parts of the same, verbatim et literatim, as may have been agreed to by both Houses, and have not been affected by any disagreement between the two Houses, may in either House be immediately introduced as a new bill, &c., by any member thereof, and shall take precedence of all other business, and be acted upon in all its readings and stages immediately and without debate, and, if passed, shall forthwith be sent to the other House for concurrence, which House shall in like manner as the first immediately proceed to act upon the said bill, &c., and should this House also pass this bill, &c., notice thereof shall immediately be sent to the first House, and the bill, &c., may immediately be signed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, as other bills, &c., are signed, and presented to the President of the United States for his approval or disapproval, as in other cases.

The resolution was ordered to be printed. The first joint rule now reads thus:

"1. In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House, and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their chairmen, meet in the conference chamber, and state to each other, verbally or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon."

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish the Senate would be good enough to take up and adopt the resolution which I offered yesterday. It is simply a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from California, who objected to its consideration yesterday, afterwards withdrew his objection.

The resolution was taken up and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of commissioners to revise the public statutes of the United States; to simplify their language; to correct their incongruities; to supply their deficiencies; to arrange them in order; to reduce them to one connected text; and to report them thus improved to Congress for its final action, to the end that the public statutes, which all are presumed to know, may be in such form as to be more within the apprehension of all.

NAVY REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution which I reported yesterday from the Committee on Printing, relative to printing additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be authorized to print, in addition to the number now authorized by law, fifteen hundred copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and appendix, for the use of the vessels of the Navy, and five hundred copies of the report proper for the office of the Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of March last, information relating to certain persons in the service of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, communicating copies of all accounts of persons charged with the disbursement or application of moneys, goods, or effects, for the benefit of the Indians, from July 1, 1862, to June 30, 1863, with the balances under each specific head of appropriation still remaining in their hands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to inquire whether that report comes here in consequence of any resolution of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In pursuance of law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is the Second Auditor required to make a communication directly to Congress?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the language of the communication. It refers to the act of Congress of June 30, 1834.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is rather anomalous. Communications to Congress ordinarily come from the heads of Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What disposition shall be made of the communication and accompanying papers?

Mr. GRIMES. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 14) to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliation committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 16) to establish a post route from Mankato, in Minnesota, to the Winnebago agency, on the Missouri river, in Dakota Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 17) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 18) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives, which was passed by that body on the 14th instant:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Friday next, the 18th of December, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 6th of January, 1864.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that that resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me we had better take a vote directly on the proposition, and if we are against it vote it down. If it lies on the table, it may be called up to-morrow or at some time when many gentlemen disposed to vote against it may not have an opportunity to do so. I want to record my vote against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I withdraw my motion if the resolution is to be voted down, as I think it ought to be, unquestionably.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I propose that Friday be stricken out, and next Tuesday or Wednesday be inserted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No. Let us vote it right down at once.

Mr. WILSON. I think we may be able to adjourn at that time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot adjourn at all.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is the question on concurrence in the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 4, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Henderson, Powell, and Wright—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Salisbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—35.

So the Senate refused to concur in the resolution.

REBEL TREATMENT OF KANSAS TROOPS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I offer the following resolution:

Whereas it is publicly stated by respectable parties, returned prisoners from the rebel States, that the volunteers from the State of Kansas taken prisoners by the rebels are and have been, since the commencement of the rebellion, invariably put to death when recognized as such: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to Congress any information in his possession on this subject.

I desire to state from my place here that at the commencement of the summer—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do; and I wish to make a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A statement is not in order now without the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Senator asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this resolution at the present time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. At the commencement of the summer Captain Brown, of the gunboat Osceola, who had been taken prisoner, came to me in this city and said that in one of the prisons in the rebel States he had found seven Kansas soldiers in irons among the prisoners of other States not in irons; that they told him to find me and inform me that they were to be put to death. I immediately communicated the information in writing to the Secretary of War. He communicated with the commissioner on the exchange of prisoners; but from the fact that Captain Brown did not locate the point where they were held in prison, Mr. Ould was unable to give him any information on the subject. Recently a chaplain or a physician—I forget which—has published a communication in this city, which I have seen in the papers, in which he says that it is distinctly understood at Richmond and elsewhere in rebel-dom that Kansas soldiers are murdered wherever and whenever captured. It is within my own observation that Colonel Quantrell, who bears a commission from the confederate government, murdered all the soldiers that he captured in his raid upon Lawrence, Kansas; and since in his raid upon Major General Blunt, where he captured some ninety soldiers, and murdered them all. So far as I know, the Kansas soldiers, when captured by the rebels, have been put to death. I am also cognizant of the fact that the troops of Kansas have captured large numbers of rebel soldiers, and that they have invariably treated them with the utmost kindness and consideration.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES, (after a pause.) As there appears to be no business before the Senate, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the following contested-election cases; which were referred to the Committee of Elections: Birch vs. King, sixth district of Missouri; Samuel T. Knox vs. Blair, first district of Missouri; Scott vs. Noell, third district of Missouri; Bruce vs. Loan, seventh district of Missouri; Kline vs. Myers, third district of Pennsylvania; Martin vs. Grinnell, fourth district of Iowa; McKenzie for a seat from the seventh district of Virginia; Todd vs. Jayne, Dakota Territory; Price vs. McClurg, fifth district of Missouri; McHenry vs. Yeaman, second district of Kentucky; Carrigan vs. Thayer, fifth district of Pennsylvania.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following select committees:

On Emigration—Messrs. Washburne of Illinois, Grinnell, Law, Baldwin of Massachusetts, and Rollins of Missouri.

On Emancipation—Messrs. Eliot, Kelley, Knapp, Orth, Boyd, Kalbfleisch, Cobb, Anderson, and Middleton.

On Rebellious States—Messrs. Davis of Maryland, Gooch, J. C. Allen, Ashley, Fenton, Holman, Smithers, Blow, and English.

On Pacific Railroad—Messrs. Stevens, Wilder, Steele of New York, Price, Cole of California, Noble, Donnelly, McBride, Steele of New Jersey, McClurg, Ames, Yeaman, and Sweat.

LAWS OF NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the laws of the Territory of Nebraska; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which I gave previous notice a few days since, for reference only.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

NATIONAL CANAL CONVENTION.

Mr. ARNOLD, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Joint Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House ten thousand copies of the memorial of the national canal convention communicated to this House by the President.

PRINTING OF TREASURY REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That twenty-five hundred copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents, twenty-five hundred copies of the report without the accompanying documents, two hundred and fifty copies of the estimates of appropriations, and one hundred and fifty copies of the receipts and expenditures, be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The call of committees having been completed, The SPEAKER proceeded to call the States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Illinois.

IRON-CLAD SHIPS.

Mr. NORTON submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas it seems probable that warfare on the ocean will in great measure depend in the future on armored vessels, whose form, structure, and armament must be determined by experience in action; and the attacks on Forts Darling and McAllister, the combats between the Monitor and Merrimack and the Weehawken and Atlanta, and the first great naval battle delivered by armored vessels in the harbor of Charleston, have at once illustrated the American name and furnished the only information from experience in battle respecting the powers of resistance and aggression of armored vessels which exists to aid the deliberations of Congress in directing further constructions of such vessels; but the Secretary of the Navy, while conveying the gratifying intelligence that during the "vigorous assault on Fort Sumter" "but comparatively slight injury was sustained by these vessels," though "no ships ever before sustained such a concentrated fire," has not communicated with his report the official and detailed dispatches and reports of the officers in command of the armored vessels executing those attacks, from which alone exact and reliable information of the real capacity of those vessels for resistance, aggression, speed, maneuvering, and keeping the sea, as shown by experience, can be obtained, and without such information Congress must grope in the dark in ordering or refusing further construction of armored vessels: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House all official reports, dispatches, and papers in the Navy Department relating to those actions; that is to say: the report of Captain Worden of the combat between the Monitor and Merrimack; the report of Captain John Rodgers of the attack on Fort Darling, or the action near Drury's bluff on the James river; the reports of Captain Worden and Captain Drayton of the two attacks on Fort McAllister on the Ogeechee, with the dispatches of Rear Admiral Du Pont transmitting them to the Department; the reports of Rear Admiral Du Pont of the attack of the 7th of April, 1863, on the defenses of Charleston harbor, together with the reports of Captain Drayton of the Passaic, Commander Rhind of the Keokuk, Commander Downes of the Nahant, Captain John Rodgers of the Weehawken, Captain Worden of the Montauk, Commander Fairfax of the Nantucket, Commander George W. Rogers of the Catskill, Commodore Turner of the New Ironsides, and Commander Ammen of the Patapsco, touching their several vessels during that attack; and also the reports of any investigations, after the action, into the condition of any of the armored vessels engaged in it, or respecting the repairs found to be necessary on any of those vessels after the action, made by those officers or any of them, or any official statement respecting those vessels in connection with the said action, or respecting experiments to test the value of rafts for the removal of obstructions, made by those officers or any of them, or by Engineers Lovering, Robie, or Stimers; and also the report of the action between the Weehawken and Atlanta, by Captain John Rodgers, together with the dispatches of Rear Admiral Du Pont transmitting it; and all other official correspondence with any of these officers in the Navy Department respecting or relating to those actions; also, the report of the sinking of the Weehawken within the bar off Charleston.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Is it in order to move the reference of that resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Not at this time, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I call for tellers on the resolution.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS, of Maryland, and Cox, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 55.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

Mr. NORTON. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, for the purpose of having the resolution referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion to reconsider prevailed; and the resolution was then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. LOAN introduced a joint resolution explanatory of the first section of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus." It recites that doubts have arisen as to the true intent and meaning of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863; and it resolves that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, as provided for in the first section of said act, does not apply to any case arising in consequence of any action on the part of a State government to compel the citizens of such State to render military services for the State under the laws thereof, notwithstanding the commanding officer of such State militia may also be the commanding officer, under Federal authority, of the Federal forces within such State.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. BLOW presented the memorial of James Lindsay, contesting the right of James G. Scott to represent the third election district of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

DEPARTMENT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. MCCLURG introduced a bill to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had unanimously concurred in the joint resolution of thanks to Major General Grant and his army; and had non-concurred in the concurrent resolution providing that when the House adjourns on Friday next, it be to meet on the 6th of January, 1864.

OBJECT OF THE WAR.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, That, prompted by a just patriotism, we are in favor of an earnest and successful prosecution of the war, and that we will give a warm and hearty support to all those measures which will be most effective in speedily overcoming the rebellion, and in securing a restoration of peace, and which may not substantially infringe the Constitution and tend to subvert the true theory and character of the Government; and we hereby reiterate that the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists now in revolt against the constitutional Government; that in the progress of this war Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I propose to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then it will lie over, under the rule.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I have moved the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the previous question be not seconded, will not the resolution go over for debate?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is it in order to move its reference?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I held the floor, and expressly moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and GRINNELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 80.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The House having refused to second the demand for the previous question, the resolution has gone over till to-morrow, and is not now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not well taken, because if no gentleman rose to debate the resolution the House would go on and vote upon it. The object of the previous question is to cut off the right to debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rose to debate it.

The SPEAKER. Not at the proper time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I think the resolution ought to go to the table as being a secession document, but I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I renew the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broome, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Schenck, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Whaley, and Wilder—52.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deeming, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Swart, Thayer, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Warr, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—114.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Messrs. BROWN, of West Virginia, and WILLIAMS, not having been within the bar when their names were called, severally asked leave to vote.

Objection was made.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the resolution be referred to a select committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It goes over, then, under the rules.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays on the reference of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order when it is called up.

Mr. COX. When will that be?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. DRIGGS submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when this House adjourns on Monday, the 21st instant, it shall be until Tuesday, the 5th day of January, 1864.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that it should be from "Wednesday of next week, the 23d of December, to the 5th of January, 1864."

Mr. DRIGGS. I accept that as a modification of my resolution—that the adjournment shall be from the 23d of December to the 5th of January.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. LONGYEAR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending section two of the act to provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, that the right of aged and infirm persons to select one of two or more sons liable to military duty under said act to be exempt shall depend upon the fact that such aged and infirm persons are dependent upon the labor of such son for their support.

CARMACK AND RAMSAY.

Mr. KASSON. I have a joint resolution to present, on which I shall ask the action of the House at this time. When it is read by the Clerk I will explain it in a few words.

The Clerk read the resolution. It provides that all of the papers and evidence touching the claim of Carmack and Ramsay submitted to the First Comptroller of the Treasury shall, together with all the questions relating thereto, be transferred to the Court of Claims for adjustment and determination.

Mr. KASSON. I ask leave to say a few words in explanation of that joint resolution, and then that it be put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope objection will be withdrawn, as the gentleman from Iowa proposes to occupy a few moments only.

Mr. KASSON. The subject demands early action.

Mr. HULBURD. I object.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DAWES. The subject was fully considered at the last session by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I think that it should now go to the same committee. I make that motion.

Mr. KASSON. I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and he specially requested that it should not again be referred to that committee. In a few words I can explain the whole matter.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. KASSON. I want to speak on the question of reference.

The SPEAKER. That is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to force the resolution on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads if that committee does not want it, and I therefore withdraw my motion.

The joint resolution was read a second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

INCREASE OF SALARIES.

Mr. KASSON introduced a bill to equalize the salary of certain officers therein named, which was read a first time.

The bill provides that the Assistant Secretary of State, the Assistant Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, the Assistant Attorney General, and the First Assistant Postmaster General, from the commencement of the present fiscal year shall be paid the same salary as is now by law paid respectively to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; provided, however, that no extra compensation shall be paid to such assistants for services heretofore or hereafter rendered when acting as the head of their respective Departments during the absence, sickness, or other disability of that officer.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to the second reading of the bill. It proposes to raise salaries.

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Shall the bill be rejected?"

The bill was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 80, noes 51.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INHUMANITY OF THE ENEMY.

Mr. KASSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire and report the facts respecting the alleged inhumanity of the enemy in their treatment of our dead and wounded soldiers on the battle-field, and of the prisoners of war in their hands; and that they report as early as possible, with such recommendations for the action of the House as they think necessary.

CLAIMS OF DECEASED AND DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. KASSON also submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the causes of the delay at the offices of the Paymaster General and of the Second Auditor in the adjustment and payment of the accounts and claims of deceased and disabled soldiers, and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to facilitate such adjustment and payment.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Committee of Claims," and inserting "Committee on Military Affairs."

Mr. KASSON. I think the Committee of Claims will have more leisure to investigate the matter, and that we shall have an earlier report from them.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the rule may be read which prescribes the duties of the Committee of Claims; it will show that they have no jurisdiction of this subject whatever.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"78. It shall be the duty of the Committee of Claims to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching claims and demands on the United States as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions for relief therein as to them shall seem expedient."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. And now I would like to have the resolution again read, in the light of that rule.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that as the resolution, by its very terms, refers to claims against the United States, and as the rule authorizes everything referring to claims against the United States to be referred to the Committee of Claims, the resolution is in order; but it is a matter for the House to determine, whether that is the proper committee to which to refer it.

The resolution was then agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, ETC.

Mr. KASSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the select committee on rules:

Resolved, That an additional standing committee shall be appointed at the commencement of the first session of each Congress, whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress, to consist of five members, to be entitled the Committee on National and International Coinage, Weights, and Measures; and to that committee shall be referred bills, resolutions, and communications to this House upon the subjects named in the title of the committee.

PRISONERS IN REBEL HANDS.

Mr. GRINNELL submitted the following resolution; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas since the breaking out of the rebellion prisoners held by the United States have been treated under the rules of war with most humane consideration; and whereas on learning that our soldiers held at Richmond were suffering unto death for food and clothing by the confession of their captors—in the language of Mr. Foote of the rebel congress, the commissary general having starved the enemy's prisoners—the friends of the prisoners and the soldiers' aid societies continued to forward food and clothing until forbidden by the rebel authorities: Therefore,

Resolved, That this is a wanton act of cruelty unprecedented in modern warfare, at war with the humane sentiments of the age, and meets the protest and execration of this House, and can but consign the authors of such infamous deeds to the reprobation of the Almighty.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to move an amendment to that resolution?

The SPEAKER. Not at this stage.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order in this House to allude to the language or expressions of gentlemen in the rebel congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question, not being acquainted with the rule in regard to that subject.

Mr. MALLORY. I submit it as a point for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will gratify the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will be allowed to modify his resolution, if he desires to do so.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will strike out the name of Mr. Foote, if that will please the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to amend his resolution. We do not want any recognition of the rebel congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RAPIDS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a canal around the rapids in the Mississippi river commencing at Keokuk, Iowa; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman admit an amendment to include the upper rapids?

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order; the previous question is demanded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

RANK OF PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL.

Mr. COBB submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for increasing the rank of the Provost Marshal General of the United States.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was taken on the resolution; and there were—ayes 58, noes 62.

Mr. COBB called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. COBB demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. As this is a proposition to increase the pay of certain officers, I ask whether it is in order to move to amend by including the boys who are in the field?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

Mr. SLOAN offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, by act of Congress, the construction of a through line of railway between the cities of Washington and New York; and to report by bill or otherwise at the earliest convenience.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 60.

The Speaker voted in the affirmative, and the resolution was laid on the table.

RESOLUTIONS OF CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE.

Mr. COLE, of California, presented joint resolutions of the State of California; which were ordered to be printed, and referred as indicated below:

Relative to the boundary line. Referred to the Committee on Territories.

Relative to a weekly mail into Tehama county, California. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Relative to a weekly mail in Tulare county, California. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Relative to Indian supplies and reservations. Referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Relative to tax on native wine. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

POST ROUTE IN UTAH, ETC.

Mr. McBRIDE offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Fort Ridgway, Utah Territory, by way of Baunock City, Idaho Territory, from Auburn to Dalles City, in the State of Oregon, and providing for the conveyance of mails along the same by daily service in four-horse coaches, and to report to this House thereon.

TROOPS IN UTAH.

Mr. KINNEY offered the following resolution:

Whereas the Government is involved in a terrible struggle for its existence, forced upon our great and hitherto unprecedentedly prosperous nation, without cause or justification, by men in armed rebellion against the most enlightened and liberal Government in the world; and whereas the Government is in need of the services of all the soldiers that have been raised since the breaking out of the rebellion; and whereas a number of companies of California volunteers are now stationed at Camp Douglas, within the city limits of Great Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, far removed from usefulness and the scenes of war: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the causes which have led to the stationing of a large standing army among a peaceful and loyal people.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. KINNEY said: I desire to say a word in explanation of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. KINNEY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was not adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected.

The motion was not agreed to.

UNIVERSITY OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, introduced a bill to endow a military professorship in the University of Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SALARIES OF TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

Mr. BENNET offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to consider the justice, necessity, and propriety of equalizing the salaries of the United States judges in the Territories of Colorado, New Mexico, and Idaho, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ENROLLMENT OF SAILORS.

Mr. SPAULDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill explanatory of the act entitled "An act for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The bill directs that the twelfth section of the act recited shall be construed to mean sailors as well as soldiers.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BUSINESS IN ORDER.

The call of States and Territories for resolutions being completed, the Speaker announced that the business next in order was the consideration of a resolution offered by Mr. DEMING on Monday last, in relation to the Congressional Dictionary, laid over under the rule.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. SCHENCK asked leave to introduce a bill to create a Bureau of Military Justice.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes past two o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Hon. JACOB M. HOWARD, from the State of Michigan, appeared in his seat to-day.

IMPUTATION ON A SENATOR.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I rise to a privileged question. I send to the Chair a newspaper with a paragraph marked, which I wish the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"A CASE OF BRIBERY.—A prominent New England Senator is compromised by evidence going to show that he received $3,000 for his influence in getting a person out of the Old Capitol prison, who had been confined there on a charge of defrauding the Government, and for rendering to the same person other services of a similar nature. The affair has created the utmost astonishment among those who have heard of it. The difficulty of putting a stop to public plundering is greatly enhanced by the high influences which can so often be retained for a small percentage of the ill-gotten gains to screen the culprits from justice after their fraudulent practices have been discovered."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, information received from another quarter, from my colleague who has very kindly called upon me, has left no doubt upon my own mind that I am the individual alluded to in that paragraph. The crime charged is one of a very high character, and I must throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes to state the facts, and all the facts that I know, and then I shall leave the matter with the Senate. I shall offer a resolution on the subject when I have concluded.

During the last summer I was called upon professionally to aid in the defense of two individuals who were confined in what was called the Old Capitol prison on charges of fraud practiced upon the War Department, or some portion of it. The first was the case of Dr. Bliss, the superintendent of the Armory Square hospital. He was a gentleman with whom I was well acquainted, and to whom I felt under obligations. I came on immediately to Washington, and found how the situation of things was. He was confined a prisoner in his own house. I called on the Secretary of War, and stated to him that I thought he was doing Dr. Bliss injustice, and that he ought to be liberated, at least so far as to be allowed to go about the city. That liberty was given to him, and arrangements were made for his trial, which took place some three or four weeks afterwards, I do not remember particularly how long. I was here at his trial, and stated to the court that I was present as the friend and counsel of Dr. Bliss to render him what aid I could in the trial which was being had. The trial resulted in his honorable acquittal, and in the recommendation of the court that he be restored to the place from whence he was arbitrarily removed.

Immediately after that I started for my home. I think I had been in this city some three weeks. The fact that I had been in Washington attending to this case, and defending Dr. Bliss, was known in my own neighborhood and to my friends. As I went through Boston, I met a friend of mine, with whom I was intimately acquainted, and who knew the result of the trial which I had been attending; and he said to me that there was another prisoner in the Old Capitol prison, charged in the same manner, and that his friends were very desirous that I should undertake his defense. There were very large sums depending upon the acquittal or conviction of this prisoner, for the reason that he had been the agent of a large number of steamboats, and the pay that was due to the owners of the steamboats was withheld on account of his alleged fraudulent transactions. They were therefore exceedingly anxious that he should have a trial, because they said that when a trial was had it would result in his acquittal. They offered me, as an inducement to come back to Washington and undertake his defense, the sum of $2,000 as a retainer. I told the gentlemen that it was a large transaction, and I had some doubt about the propriety and delicacy of my undertaking the duty. I told them, however, that I would postpone that question, and take time to deliberate and consult with some friends on whose judgment I could rely.

The thing was dropped there. I went home and stated the case to a number of my friends, and among others to a couple of counselors of the bar of Stafford county, with whom I had been on intimate terms for a great many years. I explained the case to them, and told them they would do me a favor if they would examine the law and the legislation of Congress on the subject, and then inform me whether or not it would be proper and right for me to undertake this defense. After waiting a week or two, they furnished me with answers in writing—I think they were both in writing—and although neither of them knew that the other was consulted, they gave me substantially the same answer, with this exception: one of them stated that he thought it was not only my right, but my duty to undertake it.

With this advice I went to Boston, saw the gentleman who had made the application to me, and told him I was ready to undertake the case. He paid and secured to me the amount stipulated, and I came to Washington. While I was on my way to Washington, and after I got here, it occurred to me that it might be an indelicate business. I knew the exceeding jealousy of the public mind against a member of Congress receiving pay for anything. It occurred to me, however, that there was a gentleman with whom I was acquainted, who had a very high social position and a high professional position, and a member of the bar; and I thought I would go and see him before I entered into it, stating to him the whole case, and asking his opinion upon it. That gentleman was Hon. REVERDY JOHNSON, of Maryland.

I called at Mr. JOHNSON'S house and told him I wanted to consult him upon a personal matter, and I stated this case to him very much as I have stated it here. I told him that there was a prisoner in the Old Capitol prison on a charge of fraudulent practices upon the War Department, that I had been applied to to defend him, and that before entering upon it I came to him, as a friend who was competent to advise and who was conversant with what was proper, to ask him if there was any objection to my taking up the case, if there was any indelicacy in my doing so growing out of the fact that I held the office of Senator of the United States. Mr. JOHNSON looked at me as if he thought I was rather green to ask such a question, and replied with great promptness and great emphasis, "not the least objection under heaven." "Well," said I, "Mr. JOHNSON, that accords with my own opinion of what the law is and the right is; but in a matter of this kind, I want to ask still further, is there anything indelicate in such an engagement?" "Not the slightest in the world," said he. He then went on to give at some length (not very long) his views of what the rights of counsel were; that they had been limited by Congress in one particular which he thought an unwise restriction, and that was, restraining members of Congress from appearing before the Court of Claims; "but," said he, "as to this matter you are asking me about, I am doing it every week;" I do not know that he did not say every day in the week.

Being thus relieved, and feeling, on the authority that I acted upon, that there could no longer be a question in regard to that subject, I went to the Secretary of War, called his attention to the case, and asked him what the man was accused of, for it was not yet known. He told me that he had furnished charges against the individual to Mr. Brady of New York, who had been retained as counsel. I told him that all that Mr. Hunt wanted (for that was the gentleman's name) was a fair trial and a speedy trial. The Secretary said that was what he intended to give him, and he should have it. I asked him how long it was likely to be before he would have a trial. He was not able to say. He stated that he had a number of courts-martial sitting, and his time was taken up with them, but he mentioned, I think, that there was one particular court before whom a man by the name of Belger was being tried, and when that trial was concluded he would take up Mr. Hunt's case. From this conversation, and from the fact that that trial was then on, and, I supposed, would soon be finished, I concluded the time would be from one to three weeks before this trial would come on. I then said to Mr. Stanton, "I want to make another suggestion to you: do you think that the purposes of justice require that this man should be kept in close jail up to the day he is to be put on trial? Would not the purposes of justice be answered equally as well by giving him a parole?

that he may go out and prepare himself for trial?" Mr. Stanton said he saw no sort of objection to that course; he would consult with the Judge Advocate General, and if there was no exception to it it should be done; and it was done. I then left town. By the way, I should say that it was done in this way: the prisoner was relieved from the Old Capitol prison and sent to New York, and ordered to confine himself to New York, and report to the provost marshal, I think once in forty-eight hours.

After I returned home, I received one or two communications, either direct or indirect—I do not remember which now—from Mr. Hunt, that he wanted to see me in New York. I went to New York to see him. I had a conversation with him, and I told him what his friends had done, the retainer they had given me in his case, with which he expressed himself perfectly satisfied, and said that he wanted, by all means, that I should stick by him to the end. I said to him: "Mr. Hunt, if that is what you want, we had better have a perfectly fair understanding about it, and settle this thing now instead of hereafter. I will hold myself ready during the summer and autumn"—for I had no idea at the time that it would go beyond that—"to attend this trial, for which you must pay me $1,000 additional, and if the trial does not extend beyond ten days, that shall be a full satisfaction of all claims that I have upon you for it." He said he was perfectly satisfied with that arrangement, but he had not the money in his pocket, but would send me a draft soon. He sent me a draft for $1,000, and I sent back a receipt stating what the money was for, how it was to be applied, and how far it was to go; and that is all the connection that I had with him. I had several applications through some of his friends to know when the trial would come on. I told them that I could not tell; that I had done in the case all I could to bring it to trial; that when I saw Mr. Stanton I asked him repeatedly when the trial would come on, and he uniformly gave me the same answer, that it would come on as soon as he could get it ready.

These, sir, are the facts and all the facts there are in the case, that I am aware of. If this be bribery, or if it be anything inconsistent with what is due to my character as a man and a Senator, I will say this: it was not done inadvertently; I never did anything more deliberately in my life; never did anything more cautiously. Before I close, I ask the honorable Senator from Maryland, who is now present, if his own recollection of what occurred between himself and me is as I have stated it, to be so kind as to give that information to the Senate. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether JOHN P. HALE, a member of this body, in connection with the case of one Hunt, charged with crime by direction of the War Department, has been guilty of any conduct inconsistent with his duties as a Senator; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the honorable member from New Hampshire had not requested me to confirm what he has stated, I should have deemed it unnecessary. His own word to this body, in any matters of fact of which he must have personal knowledge, would, I am sure, be sufficient to place him right before his brother Senators. But as he has called upon me, and the charge as against him, or which he supposes to be referable to him, has been made public, it is proper that I should answer his request.

I recollect very distinctly his calling upon me, as he states, at my own residence in this city and putting to me the question precisely as he has stated it. I did, perhaps, in words, certainly in manner, give him reason to believe that I thought he was not as well acquainted with the rights and the obligations of his profession as he should be. The question which he propounded to me was, whether his situation as a Senator of the United States excluded him from the right of appearing as counsel before a military court, either a court-martial or a military commission, which, as I understood him, was about to be convened for the purpose of trying a person, who had applied to him, for an alleged fraud upon the Government. I at once told him that I could not imagine any legal impediment in his way, and I was just as much at a loss to conceive how there could be any indelicacy in it. I may be wrong, Mr. President, but if I am wrong it by no means follows that the Senator from New Hampshire has acted wrong in his own opinion. He evidently trusted to mine, which confirmed his original impression, and what he did afterwards I have no doubt was done in part upon the opinion which I gave him. But it is due to myself to add a word or two for the purpose of showing why it is that the opinion I gave him is in my judgment a correct one.

The Senators of the United States, by virtue of their office, such of them as are physicians and lawyers, do not cease to be physicians and lawyers; and if they are called upon, after they become Senators of the United States, to exercise their profession, whether it be medical or legal, I see no possible objection to their complying with the request, unless—and that is an exception not included in the Senator's statement to me—unless they could not do so without neglecting their public duties. I did tell him, and I repeat with perfect confidence, that I had a right to do what I have done and what I shall continue to do until I am better advised: that is, from time to time as I was called upon by parties who were charged with offenses to be tried before a military court, I have never hesitated to give them the benefit of my advice, and of my services; and I have done it, as I know is common to the profession in all such cases where, in justice to themselves it can be done, in a majority of cases without any compensation at all, the parties not being able, as they stated and as I believed, to pay any compensation.

The only question, therefore, that could possibly arise, as I think, there being no difficulty growing out of the relation in which the Senators stand to the Government, is whether there is any legislation to prohibit it. I know of no legislation before the act, I think, of 1853; I am not sure that I am right as to the date of the act. That act was passed for the purpose of prohibiting members of Congress, whether Senators or members of the other House, from prosecuting any claim upon the Government, either for a compensation agreed upon in advance, or, if there was no compensation agreed upon or paid before, and the claim should be liquidated by the Government, from receiving any gratuity thereafter. The same law which contains that prohibition, a prohibition as I think right in itself, as far as that particular act is concerned—I speak from recollection, but I cannot be mistaken—excepts cases depending before the courts, and leaves to members who may be counselors the right to go into any of the courts of the United States for the purpose of prosecuting any pecuniary demand. Although that exception does not include cases of a criminal nature, still cases of a criminal nature are cases in which counsel may be employed, because cases of that description are not placed within the prohibition contained in the other part of the law to which I have alluded.

Now, if it be, notwithstanding that law, or rather, to speak more correctly, if by virtue of the express authority given by that law by the exception which takes cases before the courts out of the operation of the prohibitory clause, the prohibition on the part of members of Congress to go before the courts professionally was not the purpose of the act, it would seem necessarily to follow that such counsel have a right to go before any court. The practice of the Government now—I am not clear as to the question of its legality—is to try all these cases before military courts. I think they are mistaken in point of law; but that is their conviction, and they are acting upon that conviction. Every man who is charged with a fraud upon the Government, if he has had a contract with the Government, and the fraud is alleged to have been committed in the mode in which he has executed that contract, is brought before a military tribunal, and if a party is convicted, as has sometimes been the case, he has been sentenced to imprisonment, I believe in one instance for life, during the war in a great many cases, in such place as the Secretary of War may deem proper to designate; and the Secretary of War in two or three cases has designated the common penitentiary.

That being the case, Mr. President, in my judgment, counsel, who happen to be members of Congress, have no more right to deny to render their services to parties charged before a tribunal of that description with offenses of that description, than they would have a right to refuse their assistance to a man who was charged with robbery or murder before the ordinary courts of justice. I may be mistaken as to the obligation of the profession. So deeply rooted, however, is the conviction, the result of a familiarity with the biography of most of the eminent men who have heretofore belonged to the profession, that I am still of opinion that counsel has not only the right but is bound to render services in all such cases; that if a party is unable to pay him for the labor and trouble and loss of time he would have, he is bound to render his services gratuitously.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution that when the House adjourns on Wednesday the 23d instant, it shall be until Tuesday the 5th day of January, 1864, provided the Senate concur therein.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant, and the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during this rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck to be presented to General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America; and it was signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 3, 1863, the report of Thomas Brown, special agent of the Treasury, in relation to alleged abuses in the custom-house and mint at San Francisco; which was ordered to lie on the table.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, showing the progress of that work during the year ending November 1, 1863, accompanied by an engraved sketch illustrating the general progress which has been made in the survey of the coast; also, a manuscript map of progress, brought up to the same date, in conformity with the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1853.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I offer a resolution with regard to printing that document, which I believe is identical with the resolution passed by the Senate last year:

Resolved, That there be printed, of the report of the Coast Survey for the year 1863, twelve hundred extra copies for the use of the Senate, and three thousand for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COWAN presented additional papers in the case of E. F. Wood & Co., which, in addition to the papers already on the files of the Senate relating to the claim, were referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Commander John Colhoun, of the United States Navy, protesting against the action of the late advisory board, and praying for relief; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of New York, and a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for the repeal of the act of Congress commonly called the fugitive slave act; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I present also a petition of citizens of Vermont, in which they set forth that the "Government, in time of war or insurrection, may remove whatever is dangerous to the public safety, or prevents the restoration of peace," and that they therefore earnestly pray Congress "not to spend the energies of the country in merely lopping off the branches, but to destroy slavery, the root of them all." I ask that that petition lie on the table, as there is not as yet any committee constituted to which it may properly be referred.

The petition was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of William Clark, of Tennessee, who asks of the Senate, that the papers in his case which were sent to the Senate by the Court of Claims at a former session, be returned to the court. He states that there was no report adverse to his claim, and no report in favor of the claim, because the judges were divided as to the amount they thought he should receive. Under these circumstances, I suppose it would be proper that the matter should be referred back to the court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation of the public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior, in the State of Minnesota, by the way of St. Paul, to Sioux City in the State of Iowa.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 19) for the relief of L. F. Cartee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 20) for the relief of justices of the Supreme Court of the United States in cases therein described; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill before it is referred.

The Secretary read the bill. It provides that whenever the chief justice or any associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall have attained the age of seventy years, and shall signify to the President of the United States his desire, on account of physical infirmity, to retire from his office, the President may place his name on a retired list of justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. A judge thus retired is to receive compensation, to be paid in the manner now provided for the payment of the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court, to the end of his natural life, namely: if it shall appear that he has, at the date of his retirement, served as chief or associate justice for a period not exceeding fifteen years, $4,000 per annum; if for a period greater than fifteen and not exceeding twenty years, $4,500 per annum; if for a period greater than twenty and not exceeding twenty-five years, $5,000 per annum; if for a period greater than twenty-five and not exceeding thirty years, $5,500; and if for a period greater than thirty years, he shall receive $6,000 per annum. It is also provided that whenever a vacancy shall thus occur in the office of the chief justice or associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, it shall be filled as provided by the Constitution and laws of the United States in case of a vacancy from other causes.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 6) in relation to a grant of land heretofore made to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of railroads in that State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 21) granting land to the State of Kansas to indemnify her citizens for losses; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 22) supplementary to "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 7) to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army be recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Albert Brown, praying for an investigation of the contract made by him with Major Morris S. Miller, quartermaster of the United States Army, for the manufacture and delivery of wagons, and that the said contract may be fulfilled on the part of the United States, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the memorial and papers of the Mayor of Washington city, praying that certain privileges be granted to the "Guardian Society" of the District of Columbia, which accompanied Senate bill No. 466 of the last Congress, be taken from the files of the Senate with the view that they may be placed in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings of the House of Representatives, at his request.

The motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC REPORTS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire as to the best mode of securing accurate synopses of the debates and proceedings of the Senate, to be reported by telegraph for the associated press.

POST ROAD IN KANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing what is now known as the new military road from Lawrence to Fort Scott as a post road.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether any additional force of clerks or messengers is needed in the executive office, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ARMORED VESSELS.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate all official reports and dispatches and papers in the Navy Department relating to actions in which any of the armored vessels have been engaged, and especially the report of Captain Worden of the combat of the Monitor with the Merrimack, and the report of Captain John Rodgers of the attack on Fort Darling, together with the dispatches of Rear Admiral Goldsborough transmitting them; the reports of Captain Worden and Captain Drayton of the two attacks on Fort McAllister on the Ogeechee, with the dispatches of Rear Admiral Du Pont transmitting them to the Department; the reports of Rear Admiral Du Pont of the attack of the 7th of April, 1863, on the defenses of Charleston harbor, together with the reports of Captain Drayton of the Passaic, Commander Rhind of the Keokuk, Commander Downes of the Nahant, Captain John Rodgers of the Weehawken, Captain Worden of the Montauk, Commander Fairfax of the Nantucket, Commander George W. Rogers of the Catskill, Commodore Turner of the New Ironsides, and Commander Ammen of the Patapsco, touching their several vessels during that attack; and also the reports of any investigations after the action into the condition of any of the armored vessels engaged in it, or respecting the repairs found necessary on any of those vessels after the action, made by those officers or any of them, or any official statement respecting those vessels in connection with the said action, or respecting experiments to test the value of rafts for the removal of obstructions, made by those officers or any of them, or by Engineers Lovering, Koble, or Sumers; and also the report of Captain John Rodgers of the action between the Weehawken and Atlanta, together with the dispatch of Rear Admiral Du Pont transmitting it; and all other official correspondence with any of those officers in the Navy Department respecting or relating to those actions; and also the official report of the sinking of the Weehawken inside the bar off Charleston, and the official report of the springing a leak of the Sangamon at the Washington navy-yard on the eve of departing on a cruise.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit a resolution proposing a new rule of the Senate. I ask that it be read now and printed; and I give notice that I shall call it up at the next meeting of the Senate.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

The oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1863, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed, in the same way, by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. FOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is understood that the resolution which has passed the House of Representatives for a recess of a fortnight is to be adopted by the Senate, I think we should hardly want to adjourn over two days, and I therefore suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he withdraw his motion until we act on that resolution.

Mr. FOOT. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the 16th instant:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when this House adjourns on Wednesday the 23d instant, it shall be until Tuesday the 5th day of January, 1864.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike out "Wednesday" and insert "Thursday;" and to strike out "Tuesday" and insert "Monday." I am disposed to give the adjournment over the week embracing the holidays.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope eastern Senators will bear in mind that we of the West cannot visit our homes during an adjournment of less than two weeks; and we are as anxious to go home as they are.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am nearly as far West as the honorable Senator, and I do not propose to go home at all.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Fortunately for the Senator from Wisconsin he has his family with him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken as to that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I so understood, but I stand corrected. His age perhaps precludes his having as strong a desire to visit his home as some of the rest of us. [Laughter.] I ask, Mr. President, that the eastern Senators will take us, west of the Mississippi, somewhat into consideration. We voted with them yesterday against the three weeks, but we do ask for two weeks.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, at the suggestion of gentlemen around me, I am willing to withdraw the first amendment I suggested to insert "Thursday" in place of "Wednesday," but I shall insist on the other, that "Monday" be inserted in place of "Tuesday" as the day of re-assembling.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say that I shall vote against this resolution, as I have voted invariably against all such propositions. We have just come here, away from our families; those of us who have families certainly have not been absent from them for a long while. A very large portion of the members will not leave the city, and cannot leave the city, in order to go home to their families, though they may go to New York, or Philadelphia, or around generally. But I wish to notify the Senate, and have them understand, that just so much time as you take from this end of the session you must put on to the other end, and, in my judgment, it is very much better for Congress to sit here now, rather than go into the hot weather of the summer. I do not suppose it makes any very great difference, so far as the expense is concerned. We are paid by a salary, and therefore it cannot make much difference in that respect, one way or the other. But I see no reason why Senators or Representatives who live near their homes, quite near, should have an adjournment for their accommodation, when a large number will be obliged to stay in this city during the whole period of time, doing nothing. I shall therefore vote against the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the resolution as it stands, the effect of it will be simply to adjourn the House of Representatives and the Senate will remain. That ought not to be. My own experience has been that an attempt to hold a session either of the Senate or of the House of Representatives during the holidays, is an idle ceremony. Those of us who will stay in the city, as I probably shall, will march up here and then march back again; no business will be done. I doubt whether any business has been done for years during the holidays. At the last session of Congress, although it was the short session, we adjourned over the holidays, and came back and resumed our business promptly and conducted it with rapidity. In my judgment, before the adjournment is had, we should pass upon the amendment to the law enrolling the national forces. It is the only important subject that I now know of, that ought to be disposed of before the holidays. The 5th of January has been fixed by the executive authorities as the day for the draft, and we ought to act upon that subject before the adjournment. It seems to me we can do so before Wednesday next, and then adjourn. I believe that it is impossible to retain a quorum of either House during the holidays. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting, "when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Wednesday the 23d instant, it shall be until Tuesday the 5th day of January, 1864."

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is hardly worth while to add a word to what has been said on this subject of adjournment; but still I desire to say that I have never voted for an adjournment of this kind, and in fact I may say I have never moved an adjournment of any kind. I have been impressed with the idea that when we are appointed to meet by law at this place, we should continue our attendance here without regard to any other business, or any extraneous influences. I now add my voice to that of other gentlemen who have opposed this adjournment. If I were to consult my own personal convenience, I should desire exceedingly an adjournment for two weeks. It would be to my personal advantage, for it so happens that there is a term of a court in my own town where I am somewhat extensively engaged in professional business; but I am happy to forego that, for the purpose of being here in attendance on the discharge of my public duties. If all the Senators do not meet here, as has been suggested, those who are willing to meet can come, and if those who do meet are compelled to come and go away again, it is no fault of theirs; they tender themselves ready to discharge the public business. I shall vote against the resolution?

Mr. GRIMES. It is very true, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, that during the holidays very little business is transacted by the Senate; but my experience and observation during the time I have been here—that is not very long, it is true—are, that whenever we do not adjourn over, at least about half of the Senators and members of the House of Representatives remain in the city of Washington, and they prepare business for the transaction of the two bodies when they assemble for business; but when we do absolutely adjourn, almost everybody goes away, and when we meet after the expiration of the holidays we find our tables and our drawers in just as nude a state, so far as relates to the public business and what we propose to do in relation to the public business, as they were when we came here on the first Monday in December. It does not follow, I think, that because we are not always able to get a quorum, or because we do not actually transact much business under the rules of the Senate during the holidays, that the question of adjournment may not be of much importance to the country. I think that really the country will be as much benefited by the men who remain, as if there was a quorum actually in the Senate, by the preparation which those men will make of the public business to be transacted by the Senate when it reassembles.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think it is premature at least to act now on this resolution fixing the day of adjournment; action on it ought to be postponed until we see whether the bill amending the law for the enrollment of soldiers in the Army will come from the House of Representatives and can be passed into a law; for until that is done I am opposed to adjourning at all. I think this resolution should be postponed, and therefore I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow my amendment to prevail, if he has no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to the amendment making the resolution apply to both Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now I move that the resolution do lie on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have a vote on the passage of the resolution, and see what the temper of the Senate is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not rise to oppose anything; but I merely wish to suggest that if the bill referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin is of as much consequence as he supposes, he cannot anticipate, nobody can anticipate what opposition may be made to it in the other House; and if that measure is of pressing public importance, the result may be that by fixing a day of adjournment now, which we cannot recall without the consent of the other House, we may lose an important measure in our anxiety to go somewhere else to get our Christmas dinner; and I do not think that is dealing properly with the business of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. It strikes me that the suggestion to postpone this matter until at least Tuesday, is a wise one. I do not think we ought to take this adjournment over unless we can act upon the bill which I have mentioned. I am told that the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom it has been referred, will be ready to report it at the next meeting of the Senate. There is no doubt, I think, that there is a majority in both Houses in favor of the adjournment over if that important bill can be passed; and I think it would be just as well to hold the resolution up until Tuesday. I shall vote, therefore, to lay it on the table for the present.

Mr. GRIMES. That question has been taken. The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone it until Tuesday next.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion, or if an amendment is now in order, I move to strike out the last day named in the resolution, and in lieu thereof to insert, "Tuesday, the 30th instant."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that if the resolution be postponed until Tuesday next, it will be open to amendment, and he can then submit his proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is not now in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Tuesday next.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I judge from what transpires in the Senate that probably there may be a majority of the Senate who are in favor of the passage of this resolution when it comes to be acted upon; but, sir, I appeal to the Senate that it will not do to fix the day of adjournment now until we see whether we can pass the important measure of legislation in reference to the Army, to which allusion has been made. It must be done before we adjourn. I cannot consent to fix a day which may put us in the power, perhaps, of an opposition in the other House, or in this House, even, to prevent the passage of such a bill. I appeal to the Senate to let this resolution be postponed until Tuesday next, which will allow ample time for the majority to concur in this resolution to adjourn the next day if they are determined to do it. I therefore have felt called upon to insist upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It requires some preparation for those who are going so far as I have to go in order to reach my home, and to postpone action here until Tuesday, if we are to adjourn on Wednesday, gives us no time whatever for preparation. I hope, if the postponement is had, it will not be beyond Monday, so that we can have one day to spare.

Mr. GRIMES. It occurs to me that the plan proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is exactly the plan calculated to defeat the passage of the bill he has so much at heart. If he will vote with me against the passage of this resolution, and let the House of Representatives and the members of this body and the country understand that we came here for the transaction of public business, and not to adjourn to attend holiday recreations, the members of the two bodies will remain here, and we shall be able to pass his bill; but let it be hung up here on your table in abeyance, and you will find that at the end of this week many of the members of the House, and, perhaps, of this body, will go to their homes, and the first thing you know you will be without a quorum in the House of Representatives, and perhaps in this body. Now, sir, I do not insist on our refusing to adjourn because I expect to keep a quorum in either body; but I do not like, in the first place, to be placed in the attitude before the country of coming here, and after being in session ten days, agreeing to adjourn for two weeks; and then I believe that the business of the Senate and of the country will be advanced by our refusing to adjourn, even if we cannot keep a quorum here. I say again, the plan conceived by the Senator from Wisconsin for the purpose of saving his bill, will, I predict, be the very one, if adopted, that will prevent the passage of it before the 1st of January.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend from Iowa mistakes me. If the question is voted on now, I shall vote against the resolution; I shall vote with him; but I foresee, from what transpires around me, very strong evidence to my mind that if you press this resolution to a direct vote now, it will pass.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think, from the evidence I see around me, that it is likely to pass, and therefore I desire to appeal to the Senate to postpone action on the resolution until Tuesday next. Then if the legislation does take place which is so much desired, there will not be such objection to the adjournment. If it does not take place, then I, for one, shall be opposed to the adjournment. I will not consent to an adjournment until that measure can be acted upon, for the 5th day of January, the day named in this resolution for Congress to meet again, I believe is the very day that the Government have resolved upon in relation to the draft, and this legislation ought to be done before that time, that preparation may be made for it.

Mr. WILSON. The Government has called for three hundred thousand men, and has offered bounties of $400 for veterans, and $300 for other persons. The money that has already been paid to persons who have enlisted under this call has come out of the sum of about twelve million dollars that was raised from persons who paid the commutation when drafted. That sum is exhausted; and there are persons already enlisted under this call who are entitled to receive their bounty, but there is no money to pay them, and we must before we adjourn pass an act to appropriate a sum of money to pay the bounty. Then, there are calls for changing the enrollment act; and it is proposed to make a few modifications of that act that experience has proved to be necessary, and it will take a short time to do that. Nearly all this business is prepared now, I think, and so prepared as to be satisfactory generally, but not quite so. I hope, therefore, that we shall not fix a time to adjourn, until, at any rate, a day or two hence, until we see the condition of affairs; for it is certain that whatever we do in regard to the enrollment act, must be done before the holidays, because, under the call for troops, the 5th of January is fixed for drafting. I hope, therefore, that we shall not agree to this adjournment for a day or two yet. I think we can pass these bills between now and Monday night.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. We on this side of the Chamber who favor an adjournment are just as anxious to transact the public business as the Senator from Iowa; we would not postpone public business for the purpose of participating in the festivities of the holidays; but experience has taught us that no business of a legislative character can be transacted during those days. We oppose the postponement for that reason, knowing that it will not interfere with the transaction of the public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Tuesday next.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Grimes, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, Powell, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—11.

So the motion was agreed to.

CONDITION OF THE FREEDMEN.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States transmitting to Congress a letter addressed to him by a committee representing the Freedmen's Aid Societies in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. The subject is regarded by the President as one of great magnitude and importance; but not having time to form a mature judgment of his own as to the plan they suggest, he submits the whole subject to Congress, attention to it being most imperatively demanded.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the message be printed, and laid on the table. I make the suggestion that it seems to me there should be a special committee constituted to take into consideration that whole subject; but I make no such proposition.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. FOOT. I renew the motion I made a little while ago, that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that question is put, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether he will have the bill referred to ready to be reported to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. The bill was recommitted to-day to make a slight change in it, by adding a proposition which came up on another bill, but it was thought best to put it on this; and as we could do it better in committee than here in the Senate, we had it recommitted. We can report it back to-morrow morning, for we intend to have a meeting this afternoon, and our object in meeting is to examine that subject. But one Senator can prevent its consideration to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will carry it over to Saturday.

Mr. WILSON. I think, myself, we had better try to get that bill through this week. The Paymaster General has been twice to see me about it, and he says they are very badly off.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that one objection would prevent the consideration of the bill on Monday, if we adjourn over to Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust, therefore, that the Senate will not adjourn over till Monday, but will meet to-morrow. It will not take long, probably.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the memorial of John W. Crisfield, protesting against the interference of the military forces of the United States with the election in the first congressional district of Maryland, and contesting the right of Hon. J. A. J. Creswell to a seat in the House as a member thereof from said district, with the accompanying documents; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for 1863; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and, under the rules, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the annual report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for 1863; three thousand of which shall be for distribution by the Superintendent, and two thousand for the use of the House.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

THANKS TO CAPTAIN RODGERS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question.

Mr. COX. If it be in order, I move an amendment to that joint resolution. I move to insert the name of David D. Porter, commander of the Mississippi squadron, for efficient aid in opening the Mississippi river. I think it due to a gallant and able officer that it should be done.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I insist on the call for the previous question, and ask that the resolution be now put on its passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant, and the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during this rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck, to be presented to Major General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America; when the Speaker signed the same.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution; which, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand additional copies of papers on the subject of foreign affairs, which accompany the President's annual message, be printed for the use of this House.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of constituting West Virginia into a judicial district, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

EXPENSES OF IDAHO TERRITORY.

Mr. MCBRIDE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas no appropriation was made at the last session of Congress to pay the expenses of the territorial government of Idaho Territory: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to report a bill at an early day providing for the same.

PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary to secure to the widows and legal representatives of persons who have died, or may hereafter die, after discharge from military service, of wounds received or disease contracted in said service and in the line of duty, the same pension and bounty allowed in other cases, and to report by bill or otherwise.

HOMESTEADS FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. WILSON also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary to enable persons in the military or naval service of the United States to avail themselves, while engaged in said service, of the benefits of the homestead act, and to report by bill or otherwise.

CANAL ENLARGEMENT.

Mr. PRICE submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas, by treaty and stipulations now existing, this Government is prohibited from establishing or maintaining an armament of any kind on our northern lakes; and whereas a vast extent of fertile country, and an immense and constantly increasing commerce is thus exposed, in the event of a war with Europe, to invasion and destruction; and whereas the rapidly increasing surplus agricultural products of the Northwest require an outlet by water to the Atlantic seaboard; and whereas it is believed that the increased stimulus which would be given to commerce and agriculture by opening a water communication between the Mississippi river and the East, by the way of the great lakes, would, by cheapening the cost of transportation to and from the West and East, so far increase the foreign commerce of the country that the import duties on return cargoes would far exceed the interest on the cost of the proposed work, and provide a sinking fund for its liquidation: In view, therefore, of the great necessity which exists, both in a military and commercial point of view, for the construction of this work,

Be it therefore resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of constructing and enlarging such canals as shall be necessary to connect the waters of the Hudson and Mississippi rivers with the great lakes, and that they be required to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bliss, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Creswell, Dawson, Dennison, Donnelly, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Holman, William Johnson, Kelley, King, Law, Lazear, Le Bond, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Scofield, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Williams—56.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Braudette, Brooks, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Charles M. Harris, Herlick, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John F. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marey, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Melhuze, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—95.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The previous question then received a second, and the main question was ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO CHAPLAINS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment to the widows and orphans of chaplains of the Army, who have heretofore died, or may hereafter die in the service, the same pensions as are now paid to the widows and orphans of captains of the Army.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

RAPIDS OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALLISON offered the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of improving the upper rapids of the Mississippi river by a canal commencing at Davenport, at the foot of said rapids, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. GRINNELL submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the postal laws so as to allow the letters of soldiers in actual service to pass through the mails free of postage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. McCLURG offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and heroby is, directed to furnish, at as early a day as convenient, to the House the report of the commissioners appointed by the President to examine and report the claims of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, in conformity with the joint resolution approved February 16, 1863; and that said report be printed.

CENSURE OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. EDGERTON offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the proclamations of the President of January 1, 1863, and December 8, 1863, in relation to emancipation, impose conditions of pardon and amnesty to the persons who have participated in the existing rebellion, as well as conditions precedent to the establishment and recognition of State government in the States to which said proclamations apply, which, in the judgment of a large number of faithful citizens, have a tendency to give to the rebellion "the advantage of a changed issue," and "to reinvigorate the otherwise declining insurrection in the South," and to prolong the war; and whereas this House cannot but regard with anxiety the unprecedented and extraordinary claims and assumption of high prerogative by the President in said proclamations, especially in view of the fact that the President, in his inaugural address of the 4th day of March, 1861, declared, "I have no purpose directly or indirectly to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists; I believe I have no right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so;" Therefore,

Resolved, As the judgment of this House, that the maintenance inviolate of the constitutional powers of Congress, and the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to the balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric of Federal union depends; and we denounce, as among the gravest of crimes, the invasion or occupation, by armed force, of any State, under the pretext for the purpose of coercing the people thereof to modify or abrogate any of their laws or domestic institutions that are consistent with the Constitution of the United States; and we affirm the principle declared in this resolution to be a law, alike to the President and the people of the United States.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. On that I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William C. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Driggs, Grinnell, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Bulbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Anos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Periam, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—90.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herick, Holman, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Mary, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—66.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. MORRILL stated that his colleague, Mr. BAXTER, was confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. BEAMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. Urson, was still detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. COFFROTH, not having been within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote. Objection was made.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, through Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

ARBITRARY ARRESTS.

Mr. HARRINGTON offered the following resolutions, and demanded the previous question on their adoption:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States (article one, section nine) provides: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it;" and whereas such provision is contained in the portion of the Constitution defining legislative powers, and not in the provisions defining executive powers; and whereas the Constitution (article four of amendments) further provides: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated," &c.; and whereas the Thirty-Seventh Congress did by act claim to confer upon the President of the United States the power at his will and pleasure to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus throughout the United States, without limitation or conditions; and whereas the President of the United States, by proclamation, has assumed to suspend such privileges of the citizen in the loyal States; and whereas the people of such States have been subjected to arbitrary arrests without process of law, and to unreasonable search and seizures, and have been denied the right to a speedy trial and investigation, and have languished in prisons at the arbitrary pleasure of the Chief Executive and his military subordinates: Now, therefore,

Resolved, by the House of Representatives of the United States, That no power is delegated by the Constitution of the United States, either to the legislative or executive power, to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus in any State loyal to the Constitution and Government, not invaded, and in which the civil and judicial powers are in full operation.

2. Resolved, That Congress has no power under the Constitution to delegate to the President of the United States the authority to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and imprison at his pleasure, without process of law or trial, the citizens of the loyal States.

3. Resolved, That the assumption of the right by the Executive of the United States to deprive the citizens of such loyal States of the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, and to imprison them at his pleasure, without process of law, is unworthy the progress of the age, is consistent only with a despotic power unlimited by constitutional obligations, and is wholly subversive of the elementary principles of freedom upon which the Government of the United States and of the several States is based.

4. Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to prepare and report a bill to this House protecting the rights of the citizens in the loyal States, in strict accordance with the foregoing provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I want to state a fact—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Would it be in order to move to refer these resolutions to a committee on Buncombe when it shall be appointed? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. FENTON. I move to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I beg that gentlemen will allow us to have a direct vote on the resolutions and reject them, so as to get done with this work of laying resolutions on the table.

Mr. FENTON. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on the resolutions.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chauler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herick, Holman, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Mary, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Bulbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Anos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Periam, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—90.

So the resolutions were rejected.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that Mr. LITTLEJOHN was still confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. PATTERSON, not having been within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote. Objection was made.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. LAW presented a bill granting bounty land to the officers and soldiers engaged in the military service of the United States during the present rebellion; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GUARDIANS OF LUNATICS.

Mr. HOOPER introduced a bill to enable guardians and committees of lunatics appointed in the several States and other countries to act within the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRANSPORTATION OF TROOPS, ETC.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House whether any payments have been made to either of the following named railroad companies, namely: the Illinois Central Railroad Company, the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company, or the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, for transporting property or troops of the United States since the 25th day of February, 1862, and if any such payments have been made, the amount paid to each company; and also the amount paid to each of said companies prior to the above date, and the basis on which said payments have been made; and that he also inform the House why payments have been made to said companies in disregard of their obligation to transport property and troops of the United States "free of toll or other charge whatsoever."

Mr. LOVEJOY. That resolution goes over under the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. It goes over if the gentleman objects. I hope that he will not object, as the resolution only asks for information.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my resolution.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with any statistical information relative to the practical operation of the so-called reciprocity treaty with Great Britain which may be in his possession.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I see that I am appointed on the select committee on the rebellious States. I am already on two of the standing committees of the House, and I therefore ask to be excused from one of them, for it is not possible for me to serve on them all. I have just been speaking to the former chairman of the Committee of Claims, and he tells me that no man can do justice to claimants, to himself, and to the Government, unless he gives up all his time to the business of that committee. As I am on the select committee and on the Committee on Territories, I ask that I may be excused from service on the Committee of Claims.

It was ordered accordingly.

PROVISIONAL MILITARY GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill to provide for the establishment of provisional military governments over the district of country declared by the President's proclamation to be in rebellion against the Government of the United States, and to authorize the loyal citizens thereof to organize State governments, republican in form, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY. If there be objection, I withdraw my request.

SUTLIFF AND CASE.

Mr. SPAULDING introduced a bill for the relief of Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

AMENDMENT OF THE VOLUNTEERS ACT.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in the enforcement of the laws and to protect public property," approved July 22, 1861; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THANKS TO ADMIRAL PORTER.

Mr. COX introduced a joint resolution, tendering the thanks of Congress to Admiral Porter; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on one of the appropriation bills.

On a division, there were—ayes 66, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SLOAN and STEELE, of New York, were appointed.

The motion was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 88, noes 30.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair.)

PENSION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that aside, and to take up House bill No. 33.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has that bill been made a special order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it has not been made a special order, and it is therefore open to general debate.

Mr. STEVENS's motion was agreed to; and the committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of bill of the House No. 33, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1865.

The bill was read through, and no amendments were proposed.

Mr. STEVENS then moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly bill of the House No. 33, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1865, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of States for resolutions.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I present certain papers in the contested-election case from the seventh congressional district of Virginia, and move that they be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of John E. Bouligny; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

COASTWISE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. JULIAN, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to repeal portions of the act of Congress, approved March 2, 1807, relative to the coastwise slave trade; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WILLIAM C. WALKER AND OTHERS.

Mr. HOLMAN, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the relief of William C. Walker and others; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

WAR RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following resolutions, upon which he demanded the previous question:

1. Resolved, That as our country, and the very existence of the best Government ever instituted by man, are imperiled by the most causeless and wicked rebellion that the world has seen, and believing, as we do, that the only hope of saving this country and preserving this Government is by the power of the sword, we are for the most vigorous prosecution of the war until the Constitution and laws shall be enforced and obeyed in all parts of the United States; and to that end we oppose any armistice, or intervention, or mediation, or proposition for peace, from any quarter, so long as there shall be found a rebel in arms against the Government; and we ignore all party names, lines, and issues, and recognize but two parties in this war—patriots and traitors.

2. Resolved, That we hold it to be the duty of Congress to pass all necessary bills to supply men and money, and the duty of the people to render every aid in their power to the constituted authorities of the Government in the crushing out of the rebellion, and in bringing the leaders thereof to condign punishment.

3. Resolved, That our thanks are tendered to our soldiers in the field for their gallantry in defending and upholding the flag of the Union, and defending the great principles dear to every American patriot.

Mr. CRAVENS. Cannot we divide the resolutions?

The SPEAKER. There can be a separate vote on their adoption.

Mr. GRIDER. Is it in order to move that the resolutions lie over and be printed?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the gentleman from Kentucky having demanded the previous question.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Is it in order to amend the resolutions?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the previous question be voted down.

The House divided on the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 80, noes 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. COLE, of California, and BLISS, were appointed.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the resolutions will be again read, and then I think if the vote be taken again there will be a quorum.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that there be a recount without tellers.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the Chair will again count the House.

No objection was made.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 12.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN called for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER stated that the question would be on the adoption of the first resolution.

Mr. LOVEJOY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

During the call,

Mr. MALLORY said: I rise to a point of order. The resolution on which the House is voting is not the one that is called the first resolution by the gentleman who introduced them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that by mistake the second resolution has been reported by the Clerk instead of the first.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the first, though called a resolution, is really in the nature of a preamble, and should be voted on last.

The SPEAKER. It is not, however, a preamble. It commences with the word "resolved."

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that the vote now can only be set aside by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes there can be no objection to setting aside the roll-call.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the responsibility of ordering the roll-call to be suspended, subject to the censure of the House if he be wrong in doing so.

The Clerk reported the first resolution.

Mr. CRAVENS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAVENS. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ANCONA. I renew it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, Siles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Lovejoy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stebbins, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—100.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KELLEY stated that Mr. STARR was detained at home, and had been for some days, by serious illness.

Mr. STILES, (at half past two o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the first resolution.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yennan—93.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, William Johnson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Siles, Strouse, Stuart, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—65.

So the first resolution was adopted.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a question of order. I ask for the reading of the rule which requires all members who are in their seats to vote; and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the member from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has not voted on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that all members who are in their seats shall vote.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask the Chair to enforce the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot do that. It is a matter for the House itself.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the second resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 152, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Fluck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Lovejoy, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Peabody, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scheuch, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—152.

NAY—Mr. Benjamin G. Harris—1.

So the resolution was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. BLOW, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, would not object now, but would in all future cases.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, moved that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Objection was made.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the third resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 166, nays 1; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Fluck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, Lovejoy, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. So the resolution was adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. COFFROTH, (at twenty minutes past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 18, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.

The Secretary, in the absence of the Vice President, called the Senate to order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Secretary, in the absence of the Vice President, I move that Hon. SOLOMON FOOT, of Vermont, be chosen President pro tempore of the Senate.

The Secretary put the motion, and it was agreed to; and Mr. FOOT took the chair.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask the Senate to excuse me from further service on the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to know why the Senator wishes to be excused. I hope the Senator will consent to serve where his colleagues have placed him.

Mr. GRIMES. I could assign numerous reasons for desiring to be excused from service on that committee; but I apprehend it is enough for me to say that I am on two other committees, one of which I know to be a very laborious and difficult committee, and of which I have the misfortune to be chairman—the Committee on the District of Columbia—which, I apprehend, has about as many annoyances as any two committees in the Senate. Then I had the fortune to be placed on another committee, of which you, sir, [Mr. FOOT in the chair] are chairman. I do not know how laborious that may be; but the two together are quite as much as I think I can attend to. I must, therefore, respectfully beg leave to decline serving on the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will withdraw his request for the present.

Mr. HARRIS. I really hope that the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his request; or, if not, that the Senate will decline to excuse him. We all know the importance of that Senator serving on that committee, and for one, I am quite unwilling that he should leave the Committee on Naval Affairs. I really desire that he should not now be excused.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the practice has become so well established in the Senate, to excuse a gentleman who asks to be excused from a committee, that it almost amounts to a rule; at least I have not known it refused where the Senator has persisted in requesting to be excused from service on a committee. If, therefore, the honorable Senator from Iowa should persist in asking to be excused, I suppose the Senate, exercising towards him the courtesy which has been uniformly exercised towards other members, will excuse him. I sincerely hope, however, that the Senator will withdraw his request. I am persuaded that the Senate would ask him to serve, almost as persistently as he asks to be excused. If his labors on other committees are so arduous as that he cannot consistently with his own judgment perform his appropriate duties on the Committee on Naval Affairs, I, for one, deem his services on that committee so important that I would cheerfully excuse him from service on some other committee rather than lose his services on that one; for I do believe that his services on that committee are important to the interests of the Navy, and therefore highly important to the best interests of the country.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, so much do I regard the services of the Senator from Iowa on the Committee on Naval Affairs, feeling as I do that the country needs his services on that committee, that although it may be the rule of the Senate to excuse a man from committee service when he desires to be excused, I for one shall vote not to excuse him; and I think the Senate will do its duty in voting the same way.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall vote in strict conformity to the sentiments so well expressed by the Senator from Connecticut. I feel every point that he made in his remarks to be strictly and faithfully true; and if the honorable Senator from Iowa desires to be excused from service on the Naval Committee, with the highest regard for him personally and as a Senator, I shall vote in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on excusing the Senator from Iowa from further service on the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 21, nays 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask for the yeas and nays. There is a quorum present, I think.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the best way to extricate the Senate from this difficulty is for the Senator from Iowa to comply with the universal wish of his colleagues, and withdraw his request, at least for the present. I think his services on that committee are important to the country; and, with great respect to him, I say he has no right to refuse to serve.

Mr. HALE. As I am chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I do not know but that I ought to say a word on the subject, and I shall say honestly what I have to say upon it very briefly. There is nobody on the committee on whom I have uniformly relied with more confidence, or to whom I have listened with more respect, than I have to the honorable Senator from Iowa; and although we have not always agreed entirely in every suggestion that he has made, I know that his services have been of very great importance, and I should very much regret his loss to that committee. I should regret it more at this session than I should at any previous time. I think there is at present great necessity for vigilance and reform in that Department, and my duty compels me to say that I think the Department is in a somewhat anomalous condition. I know that some of the older and best officers of the Navy feel it to be rather a singular state of things that the acting and actual Secretary, as his friends on this floor have sometimes called him, should be an officer no higher than a passed midshipman. Rear admirals and distinguished officers feel that there is an incongruity in that respect which is unpleasant. It produces a state of things which requires a good deal of forbearance and judgment on the part of the Legislature; and there is nobody in the Senate certainly, in whom the Senate have more confidence on naval matters than they have in the Senator from Iowa, and I shall regret his loss very much indeed.

Mr. FOSTER. Hoping that we may arrive at a result hereafter which will be more satisfactory to us than I fear a vote at the present time would be, I move that the decision of this question be postponed until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to ask the Senate to excuse me from service upon the Committee on Private Land Claims. It happened to be the pleasure of the Senate, on my first introduction into the Senate, to place me upon the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Naval Affairs. It occurred to me that it was my duty to study those things that belonged to finance, so far as they could be administered by Congress, and to study our interests in connection with our Navy, so far as they could be administered by Congress. I am very much pleased with the action of the Senate in placing me upon the Committee on Foreign Relations at this session; but all the studies I have heretofore bestowed on the business of the Senate have been misbestowed, for I applied myself to those subjects appropriated to the committees to which I was assigned when I first took my place on this floor. I think it a bad rule to change members from committee to committee; but so far as the Committee on Private Land Claims is concerned, it is a matter with which I do not wish to have anything to do, and about which I know nothing. I hope the Senate will excuse me from serving on that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on Private Land Claims of this body.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONNESS. I have a memorial to present from the wine-growers of the State of California, respectfully asking Congress to make a reduction in the tax on native wines, the products of that State. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance; and as it relates to a subject perhaps not generally understood here, I hope the Senate will order it to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Senator from California moves that it be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that question should naturally go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONNESS. I am willing it should have that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not go to the committee, under the rule, without a motion; but it is moved that the motion to print the memorial be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of J. J. Pettit and others, citizens of Wisconsin, praying Congress "to take such constitutional action, with all convenient dispatch, so to amend the Constitution of the United States as to incorporate a provision prohibiting slavery in all the States and Territories of the United States;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of J. Stebbins and others, citizens of Clayton county, Iowa, representing that they believe slavery to be the cause of all our existing troubles, and praying that some action may be taken by which it shall be abolished; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HOWE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARDING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 23) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the southern or eastern boundary of said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 24) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from the Dalles of Columbia river to a point at or near the mouth of Owyhee river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 25) to authorize the President to negotiate a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indian tribes in southeastern Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865; and

A joint resolution (No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was recommended a bill (S. No. 7) to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 18) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, to report it back to the Senate with several amendments. I beg leave to say that among the amendments is a section repealing the $300 commutation clause of the act of last March, and in regard to that I have very serious doubts. On every other question I believe the committee were unanimous. I suppose the bill will be printed without a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed under the general rule without a special motion.

Mr. DIXON. I have an amendment which I wish at a proper time to offer to that bill, and I ask that it may be printed.

The proposed amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON. I ask for the reading of my proposed amendment, merely for information, as it is very brief.

The Secretary read; as follows:

In section two, line thirty-one, insert:

7th. All persons recognized as clergymen or religious ministers, by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion of which they are members, shall be exempt.

Mr. HENDRICKS submitted a proposed amendment to the bill, which was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SUPPRESSION OF THE REBELLION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first business in order on the Calendar is Senate bill No. 3, more effectually to suppress the rebellion.

Mr. HALE. I should like to inquire whether that bill has been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a printed copy before the Chair.

Mr. HALE. I wish that that bill might lie on the table a little longer. It has been suggested that there would probably be a committee appointed to whom the kindred subjects relating to that in the message would be referred; and if there is to be such a committee as that raised, I should prefer to have this bill go to them. If it be the pleasure of the Senate, therefore, I should prefer to have this bill lie over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, no objection being made, the bill will lie on the table for the present.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call from the table for consideration the following resolution, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER:]

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate: "The oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate, before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I presume the Senate is aware that my colleague is the only person in this body who is at present to be affected by the adoption of the proposed rule. I think, sir, that he has a right to ask that there shall be a judicial decision of this body as to whether the oath prescribed by the act of Congress is in conformity or not with the Constitution of the United States. With the view of having that question solemnly decided by this body, I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution before the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether Senators and Representatives in Congress are included within the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862; and whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

I do not propose to enter into any discussion of this question now; I simply offer this as a substitute for the resolution. I have no doubt in my own mind as to the extent to which the act of Congress goes. It was decided by the Senate, on a solemn vote, in the early history of this Government, that a Senator is not a civil officer under the Government of the United States; and the act of Congress simply provides that this oath shall be taken by officers in the civil or military service of the United States.

Again, sir, the oath requires that a Senator (if it be held to apply to Senators) shall purge himself, that he has not been in the past guilty of certain acts. Just as competent is it for the Senate to require that when a man presents himself here with all the constitutional qualifications for a seat on this floor, he shall purge himself that he has never been guilty of the commission of an assault and battery, or any other offense against either State or Federal law.

But as I said, sir, I will not enter upon the discussion of this question now. I propose the substitute simply for this purpose: that the Senate may formally decide, and decide, too, after the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary upon that point, whether the act of Congress passed July 2, 1862, does include members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives. I think that in justice to my colleague and in justice to gentlemen who may hereafter present themselves as members, it is proper, it is right, that there shall be a formal judgment of the Senate upon this matter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware proposes a substitute for the rule which is proposed as an additional one, requiring Senators to take an oath in open Senate prescribed by an act of Congress; and he gives two reasons for offering that substitute and moving a reference of it to the Committee on the Judiciary. The first is that he desires a judicial decision by the Senate of the United States as to the constitutionality of the law which requires this oath to be administered. I do not know, sir, that another decision upon that subject will be any more satisfactory than the one which has already been made. The law referred to could not have been enacted without the sanction of this body; and when that law was under consideration, it was objected to as being unconstitutional. It was argued in the Senate; that point was presented; and the Senate, notwithstanding the arguments that were presented against the constitutionality of the proposed law, thought proper to pass the bill. The House of Representatives concurring, and the President approving the bill, it became the law of the land. The Senate has decided that this law is constitutional, by its passage; and it is a novel proceeding, when it becomes the duty of Senators to execute a law of the land, that in the first place they are to refer the question whether the law is the law of the land or not, to one of the committees for consideration. It is as much our duty to obey a law, as it is the duty of any other citizen in any portion of the country to do so.

We have decided that question, sir: It is not competent for the Senate of the United States to say that an act of Congress is no law. We may, it is true, so far as this branch of the legislative department is concerned, pass a bill to repeal a law, but of ourselves we cannot repeal an act of Congress. We must have the concurrence of the House of Representatives and the approval of the Executive. It would be a novel, and it seems to me an unheard of proceeding, to refer this proposition to a committee to determine whether it is a law or not.

Another proposition stated by the Senator from Delaware is, that he wants to know whether this law embraces Senators and Representatives in Congress; and he repeats what has been said several times in the Senate, and I fear will come to be taken as a fact, that it has been decided that Senators and Representatives in Congress are not civil officers. Sir, I should like to see that decision. I should like to know when and where any court or any legislative body ever decided that Senators and Representatives were not civil officers. I know of no such decision, and I undertake to say there is no such decision. I know it has been decided that Senators and Representatives are not liable to impeachment; that they are not civil officers in the sense of being liable to an impeachment. There is a very obvious reason for that. All the parts of the Constitution of the United States are to be construed together, so as to give effect to all its provisions; and one portion of that Constitution provides for the expulsion of Senators by a two-thirds vote; and inasmuch as another mode of depriving a Senator of his seat is provided by the Constitution than that of im-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1863.

NEW SERIES....No. 4.

peachment, it was presumed that the provision relating to the impeachment of officers did not embrace Senators; but that decision by no means goes the length of deciding that Senators are not civil officers. But, sir, whether they are civil officers or not, it is competent for the Senate, by a rule, to require its members to take an oath. Therefore there can be no impropriety in adopting this rule, even if the law does not embrace Senators.

I trust that this amendment will not be adopted, and that the proposition will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. For one, sir, I should be unwilling to enter upon an investigation to determine whether a law which we had passed was constitutional or not, and to report to this body, for them to decide whether it was constitutional or unconstitutional, after we had passed the act. What would it amount to? Would that make it unconstitutional? Would anybody be authorized to disregard the law, because the Senate of the United States, by a resolution, or a report of one of its committees, had determined that the law was unconstitutional? That would not repeal the act. We have no authority, in my judgment, to enter upon such an investigation; and I trust that the motion will not prevail.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the unwillingness of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to enter into the investigation of this subject, cannot be any reason why the Senate may not call upon him to enter upon that investigation. When the right to a seat on this floor of a member is questioned, he has the right certainly to have the judgment of the body as to whether he is entitled to his seat or not. Now, sir, it has never been decided by the Senate of the United States, by the House of Representatives, or by any other tribunal, that this act of Congress does include members either of the Senate or the House of Representatives. Admit, for the sake of the argument, that the act is entirely constitutional; to whom the act extends, who are the persons that come within the provisions of the act, has nowhere been determined by the Senate, by the House of Representatives, by the judiciary, or by any other tribunal.

My colleague [Mr. BAYARD] at the last session appeared in this body, took the constitutional oath, entered upon his duties as a Senator, was here in open session, was here in secret session, was here acting as a Senator, after the statement deliberately made by the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that those who chose to take the additional oath might take it, and those who chose not to take it need not take it. That was at a time when a debate sprang up which threatened to last several days, on the obligatory character of this oath. Then, sir, at the present session, after my colleague has acted in this body, both in public and in secret session, this order is introduced. All that my colleague asks, all that I ask, is that before he is required to take the oath, some committee of this body, or the body itself, decide that the act applies to members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives. Is there anything unreasonable in this?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Delaware will allow me to say that that is the very object of the resolution. If we pass the resolution, it will settle it; the body will have decided the question. The rule, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, decides the very question, that each member of the Senate shall take the oath.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But, Mr. President, without the judgment of the Judiciary Committee, that a Senator comes within the meaning of the act, why should there be any such haste in this matter? Are the interests of this country or of this Government to suffer by having this question calmly looked into and investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary? Will a few more days of delay injure the interests of any department of the Government, or the whole of them combined? Why such haste to have this question decided simply upon a motion to make a new rule, without the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary that the members of this body are constitutionally bound to take this oath?

Mr. President, perhaps I may be justified, in stating—and I do it without any consultation with my colleague upon this matter—that the opposition which I have to the enforcement of this oath upon members of Congress, or the passage of this order by the Senate, does not arise on account of any matter or thing in the oath contained. There is nothing contained in it that I could not take, if necessary, every morning before breakfast; and I doubt not there is nothing in it contained that my colleague could not take. It is from no such consideration that we oppose the adoption of this order; but it is because in our solemn judgment a Senator or Representative in Congress does not come within the provisions of the act, and that a Senator or Representative in Congress is not constitutionally bound to take this oath.

The Senator from Illinois says that it has never been decided by the Senate or by any other tribunal that a member of the Senate is not a civil officer of the United States. I am surprised, Mr. President, at that declaration, when, as far back as 1798 or 1799, in the case of Blount, a Senator in Congress, it was, in express terms, decided that a Senator was not a civil officer under the Government of the United States. The words of the resolution proposed on that occasion declared that he was a civil officer, and that was negatived by a formal vote of the Senate. I have not the case before me, but it will be presented to the Senate before this discussion closes.

Is he a civil officer under the Government of the United States? How does he hold his place in this body? What department of the General Government confers upon him his office? That office, if office it be, is conferred upon him by his State; and although, in these times, it may be considered that there are no such things as States, or that there ought not to be any such things as States, yet the framers of this Government thought that there were such political communities as States; they recognized them as possessing certain rights, and the Constitution gave them the power of appointing their Senators as representatives, not of the mass of the people, but as the representatives of their States in the Senate of the United States; and all the authority that they have to act in this body, as derived under the Constitution of the United States, is through the action of their States, and not through any action of the Federal Government or any of its departments.

But, sir, I will not discuss the question. There is nothing unreasonable in my proposition that this subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that they inquire into this simple question—that is the only question which the substitute proposes that they shall inquire into—whether a Senator or Representative is included in the provisions of the act referred to?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as the Senate are aware, on my entrance into this body, I took the oath prescribed, but made some remarks at the time rather in the nature of a protest, the object of which was to exclude the conclusion that might otherwise be drawn that I admitted the right to impose such an oath of office upon a Senator.

I think the honorable member from Illinois perhaps is mistaken, and I very respectfully suggest it to him, in supposing that the subject itself is not one fit to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. As I understand the resolution offered by the honorable member from Massachusetts, and the substitute proposed by the honorable member from Delaware, two questions are presented. The first is, what is the true meaning of the act of Congress—does it, or does it not embrace members of Congress? The other is, if it does embrace members of Congress, whether Congress had the constitutional power to pass that act? Now, with reference to the first of these questions, there can be no possible objection, that I can see, to our having from the Judiciary Committee a well-considered opinion. I do not know that the proposed rule has been before any committee of the body heretofore; and I think it will tend, perhaps, to establish the construction of that act the one way or the other, so as to terminate all further controversy upon the subject, if the Judiciary Committee will take the matter into consideration, and express their own opinion, after considering, as to the true operation of the act as it stands.

Upon the other question, to which the honorable member from Illinois has referred as one over which, as he supposes, the committee has no right, and the body can give the committee no right, I submit that perhaps the chairman of the committee is mistaken. He thinks there is no authority to refer to a committee the question whether an act upon the statute-book is constitutional or not. I beg him to reconsider that opinion, and if he does I incline to think he will come to a different conclusion. The act, as long as it stands upon the statute-book, is in one sense obligatory; it is apparently the law of the land; but if, in point of law, it be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, then it is not the law of the land; and if it should, upon investigation, be found that Congress had not authority to pass this act, Congress owes it to itself that it should repeal it.

The question presented by the propositions which are now before the Chair is perhaps substantially the same as would be raised by a proposition offered by any member of the Senate, to introduce a bill repealing that act upon the ground of its unconstitutionality. If a bill of that description should go, as it necessarily would go, to the Committee on the Judiciary, the committee would be compelled to decide it. I do not see how in principle it makes any difference; but the question substantially is presented in the form in which it is, as I suppose, now before the Senate.

But there is another reason that occurs to me which renders it advisable that it should take the course indicated by the honorable member from Delaware. The Senate have, I think, already seen that it is very probable that this discussion may occupy a great many days of the time of the Senate, now very precious for reasons stated yesterday; and as this is a privileged question, and the only member of the Senate to whom the proposition applies [Mr. BAYARD] cannot, as long as that remains, properly perhaps take any part in the discussions of the Senate, or at least he may feel it indelicate to do so as long as he thinks it possible that he may be decided not to be a member of the Senate, the debate will be carried on by others, and upon that particular question the debate will be carried on by himself, and we may be here some week, perhaps, discussing the question whether the Senator is or is not a member of this body, until he takes that oath. Now, I rather believe—I am not authorized to say so in so many words—that the Senator from Delaware would prefer stating what he proposes to say upon the question of the power of the Senate to impose that oath, to a committee, rather than to discuss it in the Senate at the sacrifice of the very important business which is now before us. It certainly is due to the Senator from Delaware, who entertains an opinion I believe adverse to the power of Congress to pass the act, as also, upon the question of the constitutionality of the act, an opinion different from the honorable member from Massachusetts who proposes this rule, that he should be heard. The question for the Senate to decide is, whether it is not better that it should go before a committee and be discussed there, than that the business of the Senate should be arrested, perhaps for a week or more than a week, by a discussion here.

Now, as to the Senator from Delaware: he will not consider it as indelicate in me to express the opinion—I do not know, and of course, therefore, I am not considered as stating it upon any information derived from him—I do not know what will be his ultimate course in the event that the Senate shall decide that he must take that oath; but from what I know of his opinion, often and often expressed to me, upon the great question which is involved in this rebellion, he can take that oath with perfect propriety. I do not think there is any member of the Senate—I speak now from opinions that I have heard him express over and over again, in advance of the rebellion and since the rebellion commenced—who more decidedly condemns as wholly illegal and unconstitutional the doctrine of secession. Whatever he may have said or thought as to the policy which the Government has pursued towards those who have abused their constitutional privileges and violated their obligations under the Constitution, I know not; but, so far as relates to the question of the right of secession, his opinion I know—unless he has changed it in the last week or two—coincides with the very decided opinion that I have on the same subject.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, the proposed rule now under consideration gives a practical construction to the statute as applied to this body. It proposes that the oath prescribed in this recent statute shall be administered to the members in the body and before taking their seats. I understand that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] considers that two questions are involved in this. In the first place, he thinks that the terms of the statute, "civil officers," do not include members; and he insists that the statute, in its terms, does not include members of the Senate. The rule proposed goes upon the ground and declares that it does extend to members of the Senate. That is a question of law upon the construction of the statute—a very legitimate subject for the consideration of the Judiciary Committee. In the next place, I understand him to insist that, by the Constitution, if the statute is construed to extend to and include Senators, it is beyond the power of Congress to make such a statute.

Now, Mr. President, this last question is necessarily involved in the first one, because, if the Judiciary Committee of this body should be of opinion that no such law could be constitutionally made extending to Senators, and requiring such an oath of them, then the construction given to the statute by every judicial body would be, that it does not include Senators, for the very good reason that it could not constitutionally include them. If it could not constitutionally include them, the construction must be given to these general words, "civil officers," that it did not mean to include them. Therefore the question of the constitutionality of the law as applied to Senators is involved in the other question, whether the act extends to Senators, or the converse of these propositions; they stand necessarily involving each other.

The rule proposed is to give a practical construction to the act by saying that it extends to Senators, and that they shall take the oath. I at present have no opinion to express in relation to that question. That is the question, and that being the question, I understand that the Senator from Delaware desires that it may go to the Judiciary Committee. What can be the objection to that, seriously?—the question of the construction of that statute, the practical construction involved in the rule he desires to have referred to the Judiciary Committee? Should anybody betray any unreasonable sensitiveness about it, and try to get it away from examination? If any member has any interest in having that question considered before what he deems the proper functionaries of this body, and then before the body itself, why should he be deprived of it? I see no necessity for it.

I make these remarks without any sort of intimation of my own opinion, if I entertained one, as to the constitutionality or the practical construction to be given to the statute as applied to Senators, one way or the other. That being the question, I desire to hear upon it all that is proper to hear. I see no serious objection to the reference of the proposed rule, if the Senator from Delaware desires that that course be taken. I can see no reason, however, for the substitute that is offered. If the proposed rule be sent to the Judiciary Committee, they will express an opinion whether that is the right, practical, and legal construction of the statute. If they say that it is, it will then be for the Senate to say whether they will pass it or not. If the committee express to us the opinion that that is not the right practical construction of the statute under the Constitution, I should like to hear their opinion. At any rate, I see no reason why a gentleman whose seat is involved should be deprived of the ordinary privilege of having the case considered by a committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to be assumed by my friend, the Senator from Vermont, and by other Senators who have spoken upon the other side of the Chamber, that this is an accusation against the Senator from Delaware; that one of the Senators from Delaware has a right, if he thinks proper, to have it referred—

Mr. COLLAMER. If he desires it. It is a courtesy always yielded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a courtesy due to the Senator from Delaware that this proposed rule should go to a committee. Now, I do not know what the Senator from Delaware has to do with this proposed rule more than any other Senator in this body; and I do not know why there should be any sensitiveness (to use the language of my friend from Vermont) on the part of the Senator from Delaware, or on his part, in reference to the Senator from Delaware. Why that sensitiveness, let me ask, that out of courtesy to him a proposed rule to operate upon all Senators who shall enter this body should be referred to a committee?

Mr. COLLAMER. Indulge me one moment. The reason is, that the rule does not apply to all. He is one of those to whom it does apply, having been elected after the adoption of the act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It may be so; and there are a good many others who have been elected since the passage of the act, and who have had no hesitation in coming to your chair, sir, and making oath that they have not been engaged in this wicked rebellion against the Government; and I might well ask, why this sensitiveness on the part of the Senator from Vermont, that this resolution should go to a committee out of deference to the Senator from Delaware? Is there any feeling that this oath of allegiance to the country cannot be taken? Certainly no allusion is made in the proposed rule to the Senator from Delaware. I certainly made no allusion to him; and if there is any sensitiveness anywhere, it seems to me that it is on the part of those who wish to shuffle this matter off to a committee to inquire, not whether a law should be repealed—and I am sorry that the honorable Senator from Maryland, who thinks that upon consideration I would come to a different conclusion as to the duty of the committee, has left his seat. He says it is very proper to refer to a committee the question whether a law should be repealed because of its unconstitutionality. Most assuredly it is; but is that the proposition here? Sir, the proposition here is that this committee shall be instructed to inquire "whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States." That is what we are to inquire into, not for the purpose of repealing it. No proposition is introduced by the Senator from Delaware to repeal the act, but it is a proposition to instruct the committee to inquire whether an act is constitutional or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. That is the subject that we are to inquire into and report upon to the Senate. I think that is a novel proceeding, with all due respect to the Senator from Maryland, who insisted that this should go to a committee for the purpose of making such an inquiry as that. It is a very different question from the one whether a bill shall be passed to repeal a law because of its unconstitutionality. The Thirty-Seventh Congress thought proper, at its second session, to enact that—

"Hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, whether in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, except the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, A. B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto," &c.

I will not read the whole oath; but after prescribing the form the statute goes on to declare:

"Which said oath, so taken and signed, shall be preserved among the files of the court, House of Congress, or Department to which the said office may appertain."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I understood the Senator to say that the only matter which the substitute asked should be referred to the committee was the constitutionality of that act. The Senator will see that the question whether the act includes members of the Senate and House of Representatives is also included in the substitute, and as a matter to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a decision on both these questions that the substitute asks shall be had from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am aware that there is more than this simple requirement in regard to the law; but it was in regard to that portion of the instruction to which I spoke, and about which the Senator from Maryland differed with me, and supposed that it was an appropriate function of the committees of this body to inquire and report to the body whether laws were constitutional or unconstitutional, without reference to any bill to repeal any existing statute, which I think is an unusual proceeding.

Now, sir, I do not propose to go into an argument to show that this law was intended to be applicable to members of Congress; but the very exception which is made in the act of the President of the United States, and the subsequent provision which requires that the oath shall be taken and signed, and preserved among the files of the House of Congress where it is taken, would seem to point very clearly to the understanding of Congress that it was intended to embrace members of Congress as well as others. It would be rather a singular provision to file the oaths of officers not connected with Congress, with the papers belonging to Congress; and the exception of the President, also, would seem to point to the necessity of the oath being administered to all other persons.

That a proposed new rule should be referred to a standing committee of this body ordinarily, or that it may be proper enough to refer a proposed rule, I would readily admit. I should have no objection to a reference of a proposed rule to a committee of this body before we were called upon to vote on its adoption or rejection; but the rule suggested here is proposed to be referred for a purpose and with instructions; and that purpose is to inquire into two specific facts: one of which is, whether this oath is applicable to Senators, when nearly every Senator has taken it. I believe the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is not the only one who has not taken it. If my recollection is not incorrect, there is more than one Senator elected since this law went into operation who has not taken and subscribed the oath of allegiance to his country. The rule, therefore, I presume, is not entirely applicable to the Senator from Delaware.

But, sir, I do not wish to be drawn off into a discussion as to what is to be done in reference to the Senator from Delaware, or any other Senator, in case he does not take this oath. This is a general rule intended to apply to all cases; and I do not know that the Senator from Delaware is any more interested in it than any other Senator in this body. After the Senators very generally, perhaps, with one or two exceptions—two or three at most—have come up and voluntarily and cheerfully, as I am happy to say, subscribed the oath that they were not engaged in this wicked attempt to destroy the Government, before they were permitted to take their seats here, I think it is rather late to inquire whether this oath properly embraces members of the Senate or not.

As I said when this bill was under discussion, this is no new question in the Senate of the United States. It was argued here and insisted, when the bill was under consideration, that Congress had no right to pass such an act. A reference to the files of the Globe will show the debate upon it. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD], and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS], spoke upon it. There was quite a discussion on the subject as to the authority of Congress to pass a law requiring any other oath than the oath which the Constitution of the United States requires of all officers. The provision of the Constitution is in these words:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution."

Now, it is insisted that you cannot administer to a Senator or a Representative any other oath than an oath or affirmation to support this Constitution. If that be so, it must be because this provision of the Constitution of the United States is exclusive; that that having required an oath to support the Constitution, no other oath can be required of the party, and nothing beyond that. If that is true in reference to Senators and Representatives, it is true in reference to "members of the several State Legislatures and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States," because it is precisely the same language, in the very same words, that requires an oath to support this Constitution that applies to judicial officers, to members of State Legislatures, and to all officers of the States. But, sir, from the foundation of this Government it has been the practice to require from members of our State Legislatures an oath to support the constitution of their respective States. It has been the practice, from the foundation of the Government, to require an oath, in addition to that to support the Constitution of the United States, from the judges not only of the State courts, but of the United States courts; and the very first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States who was ever appointed, and every Chief Justice and every associate justice from 1789, when the First Congress met and organized the judiciary department, to this day, has taken an oath not only to support the Constitution of the United States, but to administer justice fairly and equally to the poor and the rich. The form of the oath is given in the statute of 1789, and has been taken by every justice of the Supreme Court from that day to the present. If we can require no other oath than simply an oath to support the Constitution of the United States from a Senator or Representative, neither can we require any other oath from any of the officers throughout the United States, State or national; and that would be a change of the practice of the Government from its very foundation.

Sir, the very object of the statute passed, if I recollect aright; in 1862, was to keep from this body traitors in arms against the Government. I voted for that act upon consideration, and I voted for it for the very purpose of preventing the men whose hands are covered with the blood of our citizens, in attempting to destroy this Government, from coming and taking a seat here, reeking all over with treason and blood. I do not want the Toombses and Wigfalls and Davises to come here as representatives, and, on swearing to support the Constitution of the United States, to take seats in this body; and I claim the right, as one of the representatives of the States of this Union, to say they never should have seats here; and the Constitution gives them no right to seats here; and I would prescribe the oath of allegiance to them. I would require them to swear that they had not been engaged in this red-handed rebellion, and if they swore they had not when they had, I would, under that statute, convict them of perjury, in case they should be pardoned for their treason.

These, sir, are the reasons why I thought there was no necessity for the reference of this proposition, and certainly a reference, with such instructions as these, I think would be setting a new precedent in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I was called for a moment out of my seat when this resolution was taken up, so that I had not the advantage of hearing what was said by the Senator from Delaware who began the discussion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts, that I offered a substitute to the proposition he has presented, and then moved that the proposed rule and substitute be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I have read the substitute offered by the Senator. The question for the Senate, as I understand it, is whether the rule which I had the honor of proposing, shall be referred to the Judiciary Committee for consideration and report thereupon. The reasons assigned for the reference are twofold: first, that the act of Congress which the rule undertakes to carry out, is unconstitutional; and, secondly, assuming that it may be constitutional, that it is not applicable to Senators. Now, I ask Senators, who on this floor entertains any doubt on either of those questions? Is there any Senator who is not ready at this moment to vote on the question of the constitutionality of that act of Congress? The Senate in passing the act has already given its opinion upon its constitutionality. Is there any Senator who is not ready to vote at this moment on the question whether or not that act of Congress is applicable to Senators and members of the House of Representatives? I doubt if there is any single Senator who needs any light on this question. I doubt if there is any one who has a particle of doubt upon it. There are Senators, I dare say, who have already made up their minds that the act is not constitutional, or that it is not applicable to members of this body; and there are other Senators who have made up their minds just the contrary; but I ask if there is any Senator who will confess any real doubt on the question. Some few may be one way, and others may be the other way. But whether one way or the other way, their minds are made up.

What, then, are we to gain by a reference to the Committee on the Judiciary? A committee of this body, according to familiar language, is in the nature of "eyes and ears." Its duty is to see and hear for the Senate, and to obtain information which may affect the opinion of Senators; but is it possible that any report of that committee, learned as it is, and justly entitled to confidence, will affect the opinion of a single Senator on this subject? I believe that every Senator now present is just at this moment as competent to decide on this rule as he will be when the committee has made its report. If the rule were one that entered into details, or if it were not perfectly simple, so that he who runs may read and understand it, then there might be occasion for a reference to a committee. There are matters which are proper for a committee; there are others on which the labors and report of a committee are essential. But this is not the case always. There are matters on which a committee is not needed; and permit me to say, this is one of them.

But even if the rule had something of doubt upon its face—which it has not—Senators cannot forget that it has already been amply discussed in this body. During the called session it underwent a protracted debate, which is spread over several columns of the Globe, and not a single objection has been started by learned Senators to-day which was not started then, and answered. It was then objected that the act of Congress was unconstitutional. It was also objected that the act was not applicable to Senators; and yet in the face of those objections, pressed with no small pertinacity, the oath was taken by the Presiding Officer, and it was administered by him to other Senators. Do Senators now propose to go back on their past conduct? Will they disparage or condemn what was then done? Are they going by their present conduct to declare that their Presiding Officer, who, in their presence, took that oath, and then administered it to Senators, went through a vain ceremony, superfluous at least, under the act of Congress, even if it were not unconstitutional? I think not.

There can be then no occasion for this reference. On the contrary, there is occasion for action. I believe that every moment that this Senate delays, or that it doubts on a question like this, is injurious to the best interests of the country. I cannot doubt that it belongs to us to set an example of patriotism and of alacrity in the support of the laws which we ourselves have enacted. How can we expect promptitude from others, if we ourselves hesitate? It is not here that dilatory propositions should be brought forward against the enforcement of an act of Congress passed to carry out the loyal sentiments of the people.

The cry from every quarter is for the "vigorous prosecution of the war." Senators are not soldiers in the field; but they have civic duties not less important than those of the field. But how can we expect soldiers to strike the enemy promptly in the field, if Senators do not strike disloyalists promptly, especially in the Senate. For weal or woe, we are an example to the country. Delay here will be an apology for delay elsewhere. Alacrity here will help quicken the pulses of the people everywhere; aye, sir, it will quicken the pulses of our generals and soldiers in camp.

Mr. CLARK. I do not propose to go into the discussion of the general merits of the question; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the precise question now before the Senate, as I understand it.

I do not understand that the Senator from Delaware proposes to refer this rule with instructions to the Committee on the Judiciary. He proposes to strike out the rule entirely, and to insert a substitute. If then the rule be stricken out and the substitute adopted, the rule passes away from the Senate, and it is the substitute on which the Senate acts. The substitute is simply to direct the Judiciary Committee to inquire as to two questions? They are to inquire on those questions and report, and when they have made their report, be it the one way or the other, we shall have nothing before us. We shall have no rule upon which to act, even if their report is favorable to the adoption of the rule. The whole proceeding must be gone into de novo. The Senator from Massachusetts, or some other Senator, may then bring in the rule again. The adoption, therefore, of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Delaware, as I understand it, effectually kills the object of the Senator from Massachusetts. The proposition is not to refer the rule to the Committee on the Judiciary, but to refer a substitute directing them to inquire so and so. If we want to refer the rule, we must reject the substitute. The proposition is not to refer the whole.

Mr. BAYARD. It ought to be.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator says it ought to be. I am only calling the attention of the Senate to what it is. Perhaps the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] meant to refer the whole question, to refer the rule with instructions; but that is not his motion. It is to adopt a substitute and refer two questions to the committee. It seems to me, therefore, that we must vote down the substitute, whatever may be our opinions in regard to the rule.

And now, while I am up, I will say that I do not see any benefit to be derived from referring this rule, because, with all deference to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], he will be heard in the Senate, and the discussion will go on. Whatever may be the report of that committee, one way or the other—the committee may report pro or con—still the discussion must go on in the Senate afterwards. Can we gain anything in time? May we not as well have the discussion now as at any other time? We may be disposed to postpone it, or if the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD], who is supposed to be affected by it, has any particular object to be stated to the Senate, there may be a reason for its reference; but I do not see any now.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I did not intend, and I do not now intend, to enter into any discussion of this question; though perhaps I am the only Senator who will be personally affected at all by the operation of the rule. Some remarks have been made, however, that seem to be founded in an oversight of what has occurred, and therefore I wish the facts to be placed rightly before the Senate.

The proposition, as I understand it, is to refer the rule, together with the proposed substitute, to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is not that the ordinary course of legislative action on grave questions? Senators may choose to assume that these matters are very clear; that all the Senate have considered both these questions and made up their minds about them, and that therefore it would be idle to have a reference of the subject. Sir, that is an extraordinary mode of objection on the facts connected with this matter.

The law referred to was passed on the 2d of July, 1862. It went into effect on that day. At the last session of the Senate of the United States, Mr. Field, of New Jersey, Mr. Wall, of New Jersey, and Mr. Arnold, of Rhode Island, all took their seats without reference to that law or the oath it prescribes, and held them, without a word from any Senator, or any objection in connection with it, until the end of their respective terms. At the organization of the Senate at the present Congress, Senators were admitted to their seats and sworn in without reference to it. The question was raised afterwards by the Senator from Massachusetts. So far from there being a five days' debate upon it, when that question was first raised I made a proposition to postpone it until the present session on account of what I considered to be the gravity of the questions involved, both of which I stated would have to be decided, declining to argue them then. I stated that that being a special session of the Senate, it could not necessarily be thoroughly considered and decided; that there were many new members who were elected but were not yet in attendance, who had the right of decision on the question just as much as those who were in attendance and had formerly been members, and I thought, therefore, it would be wiser and better to wait until the present session of the Senate to decide the question. On the succeeding day only—I think the succeeding day certainly, and no more—the debate was cut short by a proposition under which the motion for the rule was withdrawn and the voluntary action of Senators who were present taken. I was not present. I only saw the report in reference to it. By voluntary action they took the oath. That they had the undoubted right to do. But the question whether it was obligatory, whether, in other words, it included members of Congress, and whether, if it included them, it was within the constitutional power of Congress to pass such a law, was certainly not passed upon by the Senate.

Considering the action of the Senate, therefore, in suffering three distinct members of this body to hold their seats for long periods of time, who were within the law as much as any member can be now; considering also its action in not making such a question during the whole of the last session of the Senate, and waiving as it did, by voluntary agreement, any decision of the question at the commencement of the called session, I took it for granted that the Senate thought the question had better be decided at some subsequent time, if it became necessary in consequence of any member declining to take the oath. That is the state of the facts. The opinions of gentlemen may be made up upon it, but it cannot be that every member of this body, especially the Senators who have taken their seats only at this term, have made up their minds on questions like this. My own conviction is made up, and it is because it is made up, and made up as the result of investigation, that I am unwilling, without a decision of the Senate, voluntarily to take that oath.

I am perfectly aware that there are many men—some from partisan feeling, some from personal distrust, or what you will—who will suppose that it is want of patriotism in me, and that I will not take that oath because my acts and conduct would not permit me to take it. Sir, I should be sorry that any respectable man should so judge of me. I think my past life and conduct ought to be a sufficient answer to that. But I can say without hesitation that, barring my views of the dangerous unconstitutionality of the law, I could take that oath without a moment's hesitation as readily as any member of this body. That is all I have to say or mean to say in reference to that part of the subject.

The Senate can decide for themselves whether they choose to refer this matter, which is the ordinary course of action on questions of this kind, or whether they choose to precipitate action by requiring the debate to go on without any reference to or report from a committee on questions, one of which is certainly now raised for the first time, and the other was raised and decided in terms by the Senate over sixty years ago, against the law of 1862. In terms, the Senate, in the case of Blount's impeachment, on a resolution, propounded by those who favored the sustaining of the impeachment, that a Senator is a civil officer under the United States, decided that he was not, by a vote of 14 to 11.

Mr. McDUGALL. I trust this matter may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; for I know of no more grave matter that can come before the Senate than the question which is now presented to us. It has been discussed, it is true, before; but while I have what I might call my own convictions, I am prepared to be advised by the counsel of the Senate. I can see no reason why the Senate should refuse to refer this matter that it may be presented in the most grave form by a committee reporting their opinion. I have an opinion myself upon it, and my opinion almost amounts to a conviction; but I should like very well to have a report of the Committee on the Judiciary on this subject, for they might correct the opinion I have which I think amounts to conviction. It is my opinion that a Senator of the United States is a constitutional officer, and that in occupying his place, he is not subject to anything except what the Constitution dictates. That is my opinion, and it is very near my conviction; but I am prepared to be informed by the Judiciary Committee. It is a subject so grave that it should not be determined except upon good advice, and I think we had better be counselors about grave matters than dispose of things at a jump. I trust it may be referred.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose at this time to enter into a discussion of the merits of this case. It strikes me, however, as eminently proper that this question should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and receive its careful and elaborate investigation. The Senator from Massachusetts has indicated that every Senator on this floor has formed an opinion on the subject. That may be so. Of that matter I am not advised. I have looked a little into this question, and I am as clearly of the opinion that the law of 1862, referred to by the Senator in this proposed rule, does not embrace or include a Senator of the United States, as I ever was of the truth of any legal proposition. I am fully aware, however, that other Senators have not investigated it, for I have talked with some Senators about it, and indicated some authorities that I have read, and they told me they had not seen them.

But, sir, even if Senators have formed their opinions, that is no reason why there should not be an elaborate investigation on a subject of such grave importance as this rule proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Senators, like other men, often form opinions without minute scrutiny, without that elaborate investigation that entitles their opinions to much weight. I take the liberty now of saying, with all due deference to the Senator from Massachusetts and others who stated otherwise, that at the proper time I believe I can make it appear to any and every lawyer in this Chamber that the law of 1862 does not embrace a Senator. I think it will be made to appear from the very language of the Constitution itself, supported by the authority of the most learned commentaries upon that instrument. I think I could be able to show that it has been solemnly adjudicated by this Senate that a civil officer of the Government of the United States does not include a Senator. However, I shall not enter into that discussion now.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point for one moment?

Mr. POWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. He says it has been solemnly adjudged by this body that the term "civil officer" does not include a Senator. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that the judgment of this body, so far as it bears on that question at all, was simply that a Senator is not a civil officer for purposes of impeachment; that is all. There was no judgment that a Senator was not a civil officer.

Mr. POWELL. With due deference to the Senator, I beg to differ from him. I think otherwise. I am not now discussing the question. I am merely indicating what I believe on full investigation will appear. I think in the case of Blount, by special plea, the question was directly made, and upon rejoinder of that issue the Senate did so hold. But I shall not now discuss it. At the proper time, if this case shall go before the Committee on the Judiciary, when their report shall come in, I shall undertake to show that the Senator is mistaken about the issue there tried, and the finding of this body in its judicial capacity.

Sir, I do hope that this matter may be referred, that it may be investigated, and that the Senate may decide it upon the most elaborate investigation and consideration. It is one of grave and great importance. Many of us held that this law, when passed, was unconstitutional. I was of that number. Many of us hold now that it does not embrace a Senator. The rule proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts directs the execution of that law on Senators. If it does not embrace them, that should not be done.

I hope that this whole subject, the rule proposed of the Senator from Massachusetts and the substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware, may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I hope the Senator from Delaware will so modify his motion as to carry the whole subject to that committee. Let them make their report, and then let the Senate decide the case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. POWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I see that my motion is misapprehended. I thought I stated it distinctly. I offered that amendment by way of substitute to this order, and moved that the whole matter, by which I meant the order and the amendment, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, that they might report to the body upon the whole subject. I did not wish a vote in the Senate now upon the adoption of the substitute, but I proposed it as a matter for the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary, together with the original order as presented by the Senator from Massachusetts; and I wish it to be put in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator modifies his motion; and the question now is on his motion that the original resolution, or proposed amendment to the Senate rules, together with an amendment to that proposition moved by him, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That motion prevailing would carry the whole subject, the original proposition and the proposed amendment, to the Judiciary Committee; otherwise the adoption of the amendment for the original proposition would set aside, if carried, the original proposition, and leave the naked question of instruction to the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the constitutionality of the act of July 2, 1862; and if constitutional, whether it applied to Senators as civil officers of the Government. The question now is on referring the whole subject, the original resolution or proposed amendment to the rules, together with the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, to the Committee on the Judiciary. That is now the question—it is a question of reference.

Mr. POWELL. I was about to observe that I could see no possible detriment to the public interest to arise from referring this question and having it properly investigated by the Judiciary Committee and adjudicated by this Senate. The Senator from Delaware, I believe, is the only Senator to whom this rule would apply, who has not taken the oath prescribed by the law of 1862. As that distinguished Senator himself has stated, there were three or four Senators who filled seats in this Chamber for a long time without having taken it. The Senator himself has been acting as a Senator without taking it.

The Senator from Massachusetts seems to be in hot haste about this matter. I can see no necessity for that. To my mind one of the gravest and most serious subjects that can be brought before this Senate is, whether or not we shall observe the Constitution, the fundamental law of the land. That certainly is a matter of the gravest import. It may turn out, when this question shall be fully elaborated, that the Senator from Massachusetts may yield his opinions. It may possibly turn out, notwithstanding, I admit, that my convictions are very firm and very decided, that on a full and elaborate argument of the question, I may be induced to change my opinions. There can be no possible detriment to the public service in having this question referred to the Judiciary Committee, and in having a full and elaborate consideration of it. That being done, the Senator from Delaware, if the decision was against his views, no doubt would subscribe to that oath. About that, however, I have no personal knowledge except what he said himself a moment ago. I believe he would. I do hope, therefore, that this question may be referred, that it may be calmly and dispassionately considered and adjudicated by this body.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I do not mean to enter at all into the discussion of the merits of the question before us. The Senator from Kentucky states that it is a grave question, and it is important for the public good that it should be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I can see no earthly good whatever to arise from such a reference. When the law requiring this oath to be taken was referred to the Judiciary Committee, that committee was composed of the identical members of which it is now composed, without a single exception, and the very question in relation to its applicability to members of Congress was raised before that committee. Now it is proposed to refer the question, so far as regards the proposition submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts in the first instance, back to that committee—for what purpose? They may re-examine it, and they may perhaps change their minds upon the subject. I think the committee were divided upon that point. I doubt not that our opinions remain the same to-day as they were two years ago; and it is admitted on all hands that let that report be as it may, when it comes back before this body it must lead to an extended discussion.

Now, there is a possibility that great public harm may be done by postponing questions of this kind any longer. It may be that loyal men are required to take this oath. No harm can arise from that. If disloyal men are not required to take the oath, then great injury and detriment may accrue to the public service. It does not strike my mind with any force at all, that because certain Senators have taken seats on this floor, and have acted in this body, and have retired with the expiration of their terms of service without taking the oath, that therefore no man in time to come is to be required to take this oath of allegiance to the Government, which he may pretend to serve outwardly, but which he is the enemy of in his heart. My remarks, however, are intended to apply to the utility of postponing this matter or referring it to a committee, which has already adjudged the case and decided upon it, it being distinctly and directly brought up before them.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from New Jersey thinks this question should not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, because he says that committee is composed of the same individuals now as it was during the last session of Congress. That I believe is true. He says they investigated and decided this whole question. With deference to my friend from New Jersey, I think he is slightly mistaken. I do not believe the question was ever mooted in the Judiciary Committee as to whether, in respect to this oath, it embraced a Senator or not. The question as to whether it was constitutional or not was. That is my recollection. However, perhaps it is wrong for me to say what occurred in committee.

But, sir, even if the Judiciary Committee had considered and settled the whole matter at the last session, is there any propriety in asking that committee to reconsider their action? I believe it is a common practice for the most august judicial tribunals to reconsider cases; and very often after they have solemnly adjudicated a case, I have known them, upon a petition for a rehearing, to reconsider it, and reverse their former opinion. That is common with all the superior and inferior courts of this country. I do not believe that the point as to whether that law applied to or embraced Senators was under discussion in that committee. In that, however, I may be mistaken. But whether it was or not, there certainly can be no impropriety in asking the committee to reconsider the case. If they adhere to and affirm the opinion they made heretofore on both these points—for there are but two in the rule—that will perhaps satisfy the Senate that they were correct before; but whether they reverse or affirm their decision heretofore made, it will be left then to the Senate to decide the question. I really do not see, therefore, any force in the position taken by my friend from New Jersey. Even if the committee had settled both points, there could be no impropriety in asking them to reconsider their decision, and again giving us their opinion on this subject. I say that after one of the committees of this body have patiently investigated a case and have made a report referring to all the authorities pro and con., it very much aids the Senate in coming to a conclusion; it at least puts them on the line of investigation, and facilitates them in that line; and the opinions of the committee have great weight and force with this body. Certainly in a grave matter of this kind we have a right to the benefit of the opinion of the committee, and have a right to ask them to reconsider the case if they have heretofore decided it.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the discussion in which we have been engaged has had this advantage: it has shown the Senate precisely how little occasion there is for any reference of this proposition to a committee. I have listened, I believe, to all the arguments in favor of such a reference. Most of them I have already answered; but a new one has been adduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL.] I think it was also presented by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] to the effect that certain Senators have been allowed to occupy their seats and continue in the discharge of their duties without taking and subscribing this oath. It is true that there has been such remissness on the part of the Senate; but to my mind this is a reason for immediate action. We must see to it that no such re-missness occurs again. The incident tells in favor of action and not of postponement.

The Senator says that some of us—and he alludes to me particularly—are in "hot haste." Sir, he has a strange idea of "hot haste." This proposition was brought forward on the 5th day of March last, nine months ago, and now, when I ask the Senate to vote upon it, I am met by the objection that I am in "hot haste." Well, sir, I am glad to be in "hot haste" when the good cause is to be served against disloyalty in any form. The Senator cannot hurt me by any such charge. To my mind—and I speak plainly—the Senate is justly obnoxious to the charge of delay in this matter. It has shown no just sense of its responsibility. It has been inattentive and tardy. It only remains that, by prompt action and without any parliamentary postponements, it should do what it can to remedy the past remissness.

But to come to the point of law, I believe it all resolves itself into one single objection: it is, that a Senator is not a "civil officer" under the Constitution of the United States, and therefore is not embraced by the language of this act of Congress. Change it, disguise it as much as you please, the question always comes round to this single point. Now, I ask again, who is there that at this moment entertains any doubt on this question? The Senator from Kentucky has made up his mind that a Senator is not a "civil officer." I suppose he regards him as a "military officer," or a "naval officer," for those are the other classes. He is entirely satisfied that he is not a "civil officer." I do not know if there is another Senator in this body who is ready to avow this opinion. He is alone or in a very small minority, while I am sure there is not a single Senator whose opinion on the question will be altered by any postponement of the debate.

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to make one remark?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. McDUGALL. The term "civil officer" was not intended to define a Senator of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the Senator from California to say that the term "civil officer" was not intended to define a Senator of the United States. But that is not the question. The question is, whether the words in the statute were intended to embrace Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the leave of my friend, I will say there is no such word as "civil officer" in the law. The language of the law is much broader than even the Senator has supposed:

"That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval department of the public service," &c.

Mr. SUMNER. I was aware of that.

Mr. McDUGALL. And therefore I say it was not intended to define a Senator of the United States, who holds his office under the Constitution.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the very question which the Senate is to pass upon; and now we have two Senators who are ready to vote that a Senator is not included under the term "civil department of Government." We have two Senators who will record themselves in favor of this paradoxical opinion. I do not know that there are not others. I think that every Senator, however, has made up his mind on the question, and does not need any assistance from a committee of this body. Think of it, sir, a committee—a learned committee—a grave committee—to sit on the question whether a Senator belongs to the "civil," the "military," or the "naval" department. Do Senators intend a jest?

But we are constantly carried back to the conclusion of the Senate on a former occasion—long ago. It is said that the Senate has decided this question. How? At the close of the last century a member of this body was impeached. An objection was raised to the impeachment, that, being a Senator, he was not included in the terms of the Constitution authorizing impeachment. At that time the deliberations of this body, as is well known, were in secret; the body itself was small; and we have no means of knowing what was the debate on the question; but we do know from the record what was the vote. It was by a vote of 14 against 11—being a very small majority in a very small Senate—that this body decided that one of its own number was not, under the words of the Constitution, liable to be impeached by an associate branch of the Legislature. That was all that was then decided. And now he good enough to observe how this is treated by the distinguished commentator on the Constitution, Mr. Justice Story. In his Commentaries he says:

"This decision, upon which the Senate itself was greatly divided, seems not to have been quite satisfactory, as may be gathered, to the minds of some learned commentators."

And he refers in his note to Tucker and Rawle, both of whom, it will be remembered, were contemporaries of the decision. And now it is that this little precedent, at an early period, in a small Senate, adopted by a small majority, declaring that a member of this body is not liable to impeachment, is brought forward to control the interpretation of an act of Congress which distinctly declares that every member of the "civil" department of the Government shall take this oath. I think Senators are as competent to determine now whether this precedent is applicable, as they will be after a debate for a fortnight on the report of a committee. But this weak and inapplicable precedent is the whole stock of Senators who seek delay. Admit that the precedent is valid against the impeachment of a Senator, it is absurd to stretch it beyond the case out of which it rose. Especially is it absurd to say that a Senator does not belong to the "civil" department of Government. Pray, sir, if not to this department, to what department does he belong? And yet this is the question which it is proposed to hand over to the incubation of a committee.

Mr. McDUGALL. Before this matter is finally determined, I shall beg leave to present my opinions on the subject, and I trust that I shall have the courtesy of the Senate for that purpose. The conclusion of this question at once seems to be urged by the Senator from Massachusetts, and by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I differ with them in opinion on the subject. They may change my opinions; but it is certainly a proper subject for grave discussion. I should like to have an opportunity to present my opinions, and to have them correct when presented; and I hope that the question will not be urged on the present consideration of the Senate. I do not care particularly about a reference to a committee, but I should like to have an opportunity to present my opinions in careful form.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will give way I will move an executive session. It is necessary, as I understand, for some messages to be referred.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no; there is time enough for that.

Mr. McDUGALL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will move that the present subject be laid on the table. It can be resumed hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the original proposition and the amendment lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not.

Mr. McDUGALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now renew the motion to go into executive session, as I understand it is important that some references should be made.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator be good enough to look at the clock? It is only twenty minutes after two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution, with the proposed amendment, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Massachusetts and I were at issue as to what was said in the case of Blount. I will now read a part of the plea filed by Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Dallas, who appeared as counsel for Blount:

"That proceedings by impeachment are provided and permitted by the Constitution of the United States only on charges of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, alleged to have been committed by the President, Vice President, or any civil officer of the United States in the execution of their offices held under the United States, as appears by the fourth section of the second article, and the seventh clause of the third section of the first article, and other articles and clauses contained in the Constitution of the United States. That although true it is, that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee, at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to, yet that he, the said William, is not now a Senator, and is not, nor was at the several periods so as aforesaid referred to, a civil officer of the United States, nor is he, the said William, in and by the said articles, charged with having committed any crime or misdemeanor in the execution of any civil office held under the United States, nor with any mal-conduct in a civil office, or abuse of any public trust in execution thereof.²²

That was the plea. There was a replication to that, and thereupon issue was joined, and upon that the Senate decided. It is clear, therefore, that the Senator was utterly mistaken about the issue in that case.

Mr. SUMNER. It is perfectly well understood that it was on a trial of impeachment; and I believe history records also that one objection to the proceeding by impeachment was, that this person being a Senator was liable to be judged by his own body; that the Constitution had provided a specific mode by which the offense of a Senator could be punished; that is, by expulsion from the body, so that the proceeding by impeachment was superfluous.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, when the question of this oath was brought before the Senate originally I took occasion to say that there was no oath of allegiance to our flag, to our Constitution, and to our laws, that could be administered, which I was not ready to take. It was not required of me at the time to take this oath, the law having been passed after I had taken my place in the Senate; but I have never seen the time when I was unwilling to take any oath that swore allegiance to our Constitution or our laws. When, however, the law of 1862 was passed, I did not think, and I do not now think, that under it it can be demanded of a Senator to take the oath. I think it one of the simplest things in true constitutional law, that a person who is clothed with authority to come here to the Federal Senate, and who comes here and takes the oath as prescribed by the Constitution, has a right to his seat, and no other oath can be demanded from him. He may take another if he pleases.

So far as the Senator from Delaware is concerned, I think, as he has stated to-day, he has no objection to the form of the oath as a mere matter of affirmation, on his part, but he excepts to it technically; that is, that there is no right to demand it; and if there is any rule of law or any rule of logic, it cannot be demanded of him. His right to a seat here is governed absolutely by terms established not by us, but by our fathers. The Senate of the United States was not made by a legislative body. It was made by a constitutional body, a body established to organize a Government and lay down fundamental laws. Our business is simply legislation with administration. If I were requested to take such an oath I would take it with pleasure if it would do the country any good; but, as a Senator, clothed with my commission, and having the right to keep my place, I would not do it upon compulsion, if reasons were as plenty as blackberries. I should have been pleased if the Senator from Delaware had deemed it agreeable to take the oath, to which he says he has no exception; but he having been inclined otherwise, I do not doubt, and I feel, I know, that he has just the same right to his place here that I have, or any other Senator.

I regret that this matter should be a subject of discussion. I think there must be a disposition on the part of some persons to deny to the little State of Delaware its rights under the Constitution. There is a power in the Senate that may produce such results, and probably will. I do not know; but I would say to Senators who have that present power, be careful how you exercise it. There are such things as playing fantastic tricks before high heaven which, it is said, sometimes make the angels weep.

I warn those who have the power to exercise it gently. I do not know but what the time may have come, a time somewhat similar to that of Noah, when the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. It may be so; this may be a time of intense revolution; but those who undertake revolutionizing must undertake the consequences.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on referring the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. McDOUGALL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this whole question in the beginning, without any discussion, could have been referred silently to the committee to get their opinion on the question raised here, I should have preferred its reference; but a debate has arisen involving the merits of the question, and probably a considerable portion of the debate that is to occur upon it has already transpired. If it goes to the committee, and comes back again, we shall have the debate all over again. As we have got on pretty well in the debate, I hope we shall go on with it till the debate closes. I shall therefore vote against the reference, though I would have voted for the reference in case it could have gone to the committee in the morning.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Mc Dougall, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Wright—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—26.

So the Senate refused to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the question recurred upon Mr. SAULSBURY's amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Tuesday next; and I will state simply what my object is. My colleague wishes to be heard before a decision is made upon this question; I know the fact; and there are other Senators, one of whom is unwell, who desire to address the Senate upon the subject. We have already heard that the Senator from California wishes to address the Senate. It was stated yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin that it was very important that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of a certain matter—I believe a bill amending the conscription law. I propose that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Tuesday next, in order to give my colleague an opportunity to be heard before the Senate. He certainly did not expect that the question would come up this morning, and in the shape in which it has been brought before the Senate. I think this is nothing unusual.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it will not be postponed. I think every argument against a reference to the committee is equally strong against a postponement till Tuesday next. A Senator near me says, "Give the Senator a chance." Why, sir, every Senator in this body has had a chance for nine months. It is nine months since the chance began. We have not been in session very much of that time, but the Senate was in session at a called session for several days, and this is the second week of the present session. I see no occasion for a postponement. Every such proposition is in the nature of a dilatory motion, and I think the Senate owes it to itself to act promptly on a matter like this, with regard to which there can be no real question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I cannot imagine the cause of the extreme anxiety which is manifested here for what is called prompt action in reference to this matter. I presume there is nobody who, in the heat and zeal of his patriotism, thinks the existence of this Government depends upon the immediate decision of this question. It is not probable, at least, that the institutions of the country will be overthrown, that the Constitution will be subverted, that the Union will be destroyed, that universal anarchy will ensue if the Senate does not proceed at once to act upon this matter.

Nothing will be gained, certainly, by persistence in this course of forcing on a decision this afternoon. The question will be debated, and more time will be saved perhaps by allowing Senators an opportunity to present their views in a connected and well digested form, than by forcing them into a debate thus hurriedly without giving them an opportunity so to arrange their argument as to confine it strictly to the matter before the Senate. I hope, therefore, the motion to postpone will prevail.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I voted against referring this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary for the reason that the matter had been once very thoroughly argued as I thought; all the considerations that could be presented again were once presented to the Senate; and Congress on full deliberation passed a law, with the approval of the President, which is upon the statute-book. I thought, therefore, that it was entirely unnecessary, and would only lead to a waste of time, to refer the question to the same committee to come back with the same views, having my opinion very definitely formed on the subject, and being ready to vote upon it when it should arrive at the proper stage for a vote.

This is a different question entirely. It is a mere question of postponement, and it is put upon such grounds that I do not feel myself at liberty to refuse it so far as I am individually concerned. It certainly is a very interesting question to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] His colleague states that he wishes to be heard before the Senate, that he is unwell, and is not quite ready; and that other gentlemen wish to be heard upon it. We have always acceded, unless in cases of very great emergency, to requests of that kind. It certainly is a question of great importance to the Senator from Delaware, because if he declines to take the oath there then comes the further question what course the Senate is to adopt, and that question becomes a very important one to him, because, as I understand the facts, he has already proceeded in the face of the law itself, which provides expressly that no payment shall be made to a Senator for his service until he has taken the oath.

More than all that; there is some excuse for the Senator. He says here himself that he took it for granted, as the Senate allowed other gentlemen to go through a whole session and to receive their compensation, and to go away without applying the oath to them, or requiring that they should take it, that the Senate perceived and had come to the decision in its own mind, unexpressed in any other way, that the law did not apply to Senators; and perhaps he was justified in coming to that conclusion.

Under these circumstances, with reference to a question so important to the individual as well as to the Senate and the country, for I accede to its importance, although I am not disposed myself to go over the whole ground again in regard to a matter which has been solemnly decided, if gentlemen on the other side are disposed to do so, I can see no impropriety in it; and I do not see how, without a violation of the ordinary course of proceeding in the Senate, we can refuse a delay of a day or two to the Senator if he wishes to be heard upon the question. I shall, therefore, vote for the postponement; and although I do not usually give the reasons for voting upon questions merely of postponement, yet, in consequence of the strong statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, that it is only delay which ought not to be granted, I have felt inclined to give the reasons for my differing from him.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that there is a middle course which, perhaps, we can all unite upon. The Senator from Wisconsin has already suggested the importance of an executive session. There are papers, it is well known, now upon the table in executive session, which ought to be referred; and if there is no objection, I will make a motion for an executive session, leaving this as the pending business to be resumed on Monday. It will come up then, of course, on Monday. I think that, perhaps, would satisfy the idea of the Senator from Maine. My only objection to the postponement till Tuesday is that it is possible that the Senate may adjourn over from Tuesday till after the holidays, and that might be in the way of our getting a final decision on this question before the adjournment. I think the Senate ought not to leave for any holidays until it has decided this question. While I assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, and certainly shall not stand in the way of any reasonable request for time, if any Senator desires it in any discussion in this body, yet I do think, on the other hand, with reference to the public interests, we ought to endeavor to have a decision at as early a day as possible. If there is no objection, I will now interpose a motion for an executive session. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, the Chair will entertain that motion, and put the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I will make a single remark to facilitate the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts. Gentlemen have said that this whole subject has been considered by the present Senate. That is a mistake in fact. There is some new material, and there are some able members of this body who have never yet had an opportunity of considering or discussing the question. The new members of the Senate who took their seats at the commencement of this Congress and at the last extra executive session, have not had the opportunity of debating or considering the question. I think they ought to have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 21, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of February 25, 1863, a copy of the record of the proceedings of a naval general court-martial, convened at the Boston navy-yard in January, 1863, in the case of Commander Charles Hunter, of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIXON presented six petitions of bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, praying for such a modification of the enrollment act that clergymen and candidates for the ministry, engaged in clerical studies, shall be regarded as non-combatants, and employed as chaplains or in hospitals; or that a certain sum shall be levied upon every clergyman and candidate for the ministry liable to draft, unless he chooses to be enrolled; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Sanilac county, Michigan, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Stevens's Landing to Maple Valley in that county, and also for the establishment of post offices in Fremont and Maple Valley townships; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARLAN presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of an act emancipating all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of citizens of Des Moines, and two petitions of citizens of Burlington, Iowa, praying for the establishment of a uniform ambulance and hospital system for the armies of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of Charles F. Swallow and other hospital stewards of the United States Army general hospital at Chester, Pennsylvania, praying that their rank and grade may be raised to that of a first lieutenant of infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask leave to present a petition of all the commissioned officers of the first brigade in the regular Army, praying that tobacco rations may be issued to the soldiers. My fondness for tobacco is such that I may not be considered an impartial witness; but I am inclined to think that the prayer of the petition should be granted. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the memorial of F. B. Groff, of Maryland, praying that he be allowed payment of his account for subsisting recruits for the first regiment of Maryland volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY presented additional papers in support of the claim of J. O. Armes, praying compensation for property destroyed by United States troops; which, with his papers already on file, were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Samuel Pickard and others, citizens of Maine, praying that the surviving officers and soldiers of the war of 1812 and the Mexican war, who have been paid for only a part of the time since their services were rendered, may be allowed back pay up to the time their pensions commenced; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented a memorial of a committee of citizens of Parkersburg, West Virginia, and also a petition of citizens of the States of Ohio and West Virginia, praying that the city of Parkersburg may be made a port of entry; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask leave to offer the petition of William W. Thayer, of Boston, praying that a pension may be granted to the son of the late Alexander Hichborn, who lost his life in the service of his country, and who was a contract surgeon. By our existing laws pensions are not allowed to contract surgeons, and this petition prays that one be allowed in this case. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORGAN. I am requested to lay before the Senate a series of resolutions unanimously adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of New York to promote volunteering, asking that the pay of the privates in the military service may be increased to twenty dollars a month, and approving of the call of the President for more volunteers. I ask that the resolutions be laid upon the table and printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table, and the motion to print will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of the bishop and assistant bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania, praying for such a modification of the enrollment act as will provide that clergymen and candidates for the ministry may be regarded as non-combatants; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of J. M. Johnson and others, hospital stewards of the United States Army, praying for an increase of their rank and pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented two petitions of soldiers, who volunteered and enlisted in the service of the United States for the period of nine months, praying that a bounty of twenty-five dollars may be given them; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COWAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in relation to the claim of John C. Magill for payment for horses delivered to Shields's division of the United States Army, in May, 1862, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Henry P. Blanchard, praying compensation for services rendered as United States marshal of the consular court of the United States at Canton be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That all memorials and other papers referring to the subject of French spoils of American commerce be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the memorial of the Wine Growers' Association of California, praying for a reduction of the tax on the production of native wines, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire what number of copies of the President's message with the reports of the heads of Departments should be printed, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand additional copies of the President's message and the reports of the heads of Departments.

ARMY DESERTIONS TO REBELS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to the Senate the names of all the officers, non-commissioned officers, (and privates, if any,) in the regular Army, who, between the 1st day of December, 1860, and the 1st day of December, 1863, left the service, either by resignation or desertion, stating which, to engage in the rebellion against the Government of the United States, giving the grade or rank of the officers, and also designating such (if any) as have been formally dismissed by the President.

NAVY DESERTIONS TO REBELS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to the Senate the names of all the officers of the Navy and of the marine corps who, between the 1st day of December, 1860, and the 1st day of December, 1863, left the service, either by resignation or desertion, stating which, to engage in the rebellion against the Government of the United States, giving the grade or rank, and also designating such, if any, as have been formally dismissed by the President.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. WILSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making it illegal for a member of Congress to act as counsel in any case in which the United States is concerned.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 26) to amend an act to provide for the public instruction of youth in primary schools throughout the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, approved May 20, 1860; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 7) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause surveys, plans, and estimates to be made for the purpose of improving the drainage and sewerage of the city of Washington, and supplying the Insane Asylum with Potomac water; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of the last sitting, which now comes up, and which is also the subject-matter before the Senate after the expiration of the morning hour, is the following resolution, submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] amending the rules of the Senate:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate: "The oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator, in open Senate, before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary."

The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] to strike out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether Senators and Representatives in Congress are included within the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the question now before the Senate is not upon the adoption either of the rule or of the amendment, but on the motion which I made that the further consideration of the whole subject be postponed until Tuesday next. That was the question pending at the time the Senate adjourned on Friday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The present occupant was not occupying the chair at that time. The question is on postponing the further consideration of this subject until Tuesday.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to make a few brief remarks to the Senate, to explain my own position in reference to this subject, before the vote is taken on that motion. It is my desire, whenever the question comes up for the decision of the Senate, to express my views fully, and to explain the grounds on which I consider this law unconstitutional. I believe I am the only member of the Senate who has not taken the new oath, as it is called. The usual oath was administered to me when I took my seat in the Senate at its last session. I wish to recall the recollection of Senators to the facts of this case, that they may then determine whether they consider it right and proper that I should be forced immediately to defend the position which I have assumed, (and, as it is one which I assume alone, it is one of responsibility,) or whether they will give me some further time for preparation for the argument that I desire to submit to the Senate.

The facts are these: the bill prescribing this oath for officers of the United States came from the House of Representatives in the month of June, 1862. Without noticing all the proceedings, I will state that I think it came on the 6th of June and was reported back from the Judiciary Committee on the 10th of June, and it was taken up in a few days afterwards, and, during the morning hour, taken up on several occasions. In the short discussions which took place in reference to the bill, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] opposed it from its first introduction to the Senate, and my colleague made a suggestion that clearly the President of the United States ought to be excepted. To that suggestion the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary yielded. But it was also pressed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky that Senators and Representatives could not within the Constitution have any other oath propounded to them than an oath to support that Constitution. That was his position. When the bill came to its discussion, before the vote of the Senate was taken on its first passage here, the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, as I stated, yielding to the suggestion of my colleague, proposed, himself, (though the bill had then passed without argument or discussion to its third reading,) a motion for a rehearing, and moved an amendment excepting the President of the United States, not in words, but excepting such officers for whom the form of oath was prescribed in the Constitution. That was his doctrine. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, I think, I am almost sure—at all events a Senator moved to amend that amendment by excepting also members of Congress. The debate went on upon that ground. No reason was assigned except that the act would be unconstitutional if it included members of Congress. After a discussion, in which the honorable Senator from Illinois contended that it was not unconstitutional, and in which my colleague, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. CARLILE,] argued against the constitutionality of such legislation, the vote of the Senate was taken, and there could be no other inference drawn from that decision than that they considered the bill unconstitutional if members of Congress were included in it, because by a vote of 20 to 18 they did amend it by excepting members of Congress from the operation of the law, and that was after discussion.

The mode in which the bill then progressed was this: there were several other amendments offered by other Senators—I forget what number; I think four or five; nor can I recall what the character of those amendments was which were adopted by the Senate. I was not present at the time the vote was taken on the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which prevailed, and with which the Senate passed the bill, and I did not vote upon it; I was not present at the debate; but the bill passed in that shape. When it went to the House of Representatives, the House rejected all the amendments of the Senate, and asked for a committee of conference. The Senate insisted on their amendments, and authorized a committee of conference to be appointed by the Chair. The Chair appointed the honorable Senator from New York, (Mr. King,) not now a member of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and a third Senator whose name does not appear to the report, (and I have been unable to find it,) who dissented from the report. That committee met the committee of the House, and I think about the middle of June, the 15th or 16th, the committee of conference reported back that the committee of the House agreed to recede from their disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate except one, and that one they agreed to modify by excepting the President of the United States, but throwing out the exception of members of Congress. That was the report that came back to us.

Thus the views of the honorable Senator from Illinois were certainly carried out in that report. The question, though, which came before the Senate was simply the question of agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; and, as you well know, our practice requires that it must be rejected as a whole or must be accepted as a whole. One of the honorable Senators whom I have now in my eye objected to that practice and usage of the Senate as not being parliamentary. I think he was right. I think it would be wiser and better if the Senate could adopt some of the recommendations of a conference committee on different propositions which are distinct in themselves, and reject others; but such had not been its practice. The honorable Senator made no motion, though he made a somewhat long argument, and a very strong one, in favor of the position he assumed in reference to the true character of parliamentary law. Under this vote on acceding to the report of the committee, the Senate did accede to the report, and so the bill became a law.

Now, sir, the second question which is involved here was not before Congress at all. I have a right to assume that at least this is a gravely doubtful constitutional question, when, on the argument of the question, this body decided against the inclusion of members of Congress—the very body that subsequently agreed to the law, in the mode in which I have stated, only by agreeing to the report of the committee of conference in order to save some amendments. That would be perfectly consistent with the fact that, having previously decided that members of Congress could not be constitutionally included in the law, it would make no difference if they got their other amendments in by agreeing to that report, because they would be excepted by the operation of the Constitution. That would be but a fair inference. I drew that inference. As I tell you, I was not present at the debate, but I read it.

After this law was passed, four members of the Senate, who were here at the last session, were elected. It went into effect at once. Three of those four members held out during the terms for which they were appointed, and acted as Senators, just as I have been acting since my reelection, under the ordinary oath. The fourth—I think I am not mistaken—the honorable Senator from Illinois that is not now in his seat, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] also acted under the ordinary oath, for no other oath was administered during that session by the body which passed the law. At the special session of the Senate, I think, the honorable Senator from Illinois, now absent, was not present, and I presume that he and I alone have not taken the oath. What his action would be, whether he would take it under protest, or whether he would desire first the decision of the Senate, I have no means of knowledge, for I have had no communication with him since the Senate adjourned at the former session.

Under these circumstances, sir, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, for the first time, brought up the question of an order of the Senate after all the new members had been sworn in. That order, I supposed, would bring up the decision of the question. I thought it unwise to decide it with a Senate which then had but about thirty-seven members present, and I suggested a postponement, but I made no motion. Finding that the debate was going on, I retired for the purpose of consulting those works which I thought necessary, and making that preparation to submit my views which I intended to do, if it was the pleasure of the Senate then to persist in the determination of the question. The next day, or certainly if not the next day the next day but one, under some sort of voluntary arrangement honorable Senators, under protest, took this oath, and the motion was withdrawn. Of course I had no right to consider it in any other mode than the determination of the Senate that the action was purely voluntary. If the motion had been suffered to remain until every Senator had taken the oath voluntarily, I should then have understood it was the intention again to raise the question at this session; but it was withdrawn, not on any vote of the Senate, but by a kind of understanding to which I was no party, not being present when it took place.

The consequence of this was that I drew the conclusion from all these facts that that was the determination at which the Senate had arrived, that it would be left to my own option. During the present session no motion was made until Thursday last. I was not then in the city. The order was then introduced, and I came up on Thursday evening. I had not been well, and had not attended in my place in the Senate. I came up to the Senate on Friday, and the motion was pressed then; a reference of it was refused. The reason why I desired a reference was, that it was my determination not to trouble the Senate further if the Judiciary Committee, when it was referred to them, excepting, of course, my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] whose opinions I knew, should be unanimous in their decision that the law was constitutional and obligatory. If, on the contrary, there were divided opinions in the committee, it would then come properly before the Senate on the decision of a constitutional question of the gravest character.

Under these circumstances, sir, of course I must be prepared to present my views for the course which I have taken of refusing, or declining, if you please, to take this oath, whenever it may be the pleasure of the Senate that it shall be done; and I say to you, with entire frankness and sincerity, that if the motion that was made at the called session of the Senate had been suffered to remain, and had not been withdrawn, I should, in the vacation, during the recess of the Senate, have prepared myself for the argument. I did not do so, because the view I took of it was that it was left to voluntary action. But, as the question is now brought up, and the Senate seem to be determined to have it decided, I must leave it to them to say whether, on such a question, which has been but partially debated in the body, and in which the only direct vote taken was against the constitutionality of the law by the very body that adopted it, I shall have an opportunity for preparation. If it is the pleasure of the Senate that I must say what I have to say, or make my exposition of my views here, to-morrow or the next day, of course I shall be bound by their decision, whether I be prepared or not. I have thought of this question; I have read sufficiently to make up my own mind; but every honorable member will understand that on an argument of a question of this kind, authorities must be referred to, facts must be collected, in order to present the subject in such a manner as will conduce to impress the body.

Now, sir, I leave it to the decision of the Senate altogether. I have no personal motive whatever for delay in this proceeding. On the contrary, for myself, individually, I would a great deal rather (as I find now it is the sense of the Senate to make the determination) it were made at an early day; but I do want to be heard on full preparation, I admit. If the Senate, after what I have stated to them, deem that the time proposed is sufficient, since this motion was brought in on Thursday, and that it is my duty to be ready at once to express my views, of course I must obey their mandate, and go on at once, though my argument may be more imperfect than I could desire to make it; though I may be obliged to leave out some references which I should wish to make. I am in the hands of the Senate in that respect. I leave the matter entirely to the decision of the Senate, with the statement I have made; but it does seem to me that it cannot be assumed, as I think it was assumed in the debate of Friday, that the Senate has made up its mind on this question. There are many new Senators elected. In the old body there was serious division of opinion on this very question, and when the direct question was up, a majority were against the measure so far as they voted. The members who have become members of the Senate for the first time since, of course cannot be supposed to be acquainted with this question, or to have investigated it so as to give to such a constitutional question a proper decision; yet there can be no doubt that the Senate is the proper tribunal in this case, in reference to its own members, judicially to determine whether the law is valid, obligatory, and constitutional, or not. I do not doubt for a moment that that decision will be obligatory upon me or upon any other member; and although I consider myself just as fully a Senator now as any member of this body, still, in deference to the decision of the Senate, I should feel that I had but one alternative—either to obey their order and take the oath, or to relinquish the seat that I hold here. What course I shall take is of course a matter for subsequent determination; and it would be unwise and improper, in my judgment, for me now to indicate or state what will be my action after the Senate shall have arrived at a decision. I leave the matter of the disposition of this question entirely to the sense and judgment of the Senate. It is a grave question, which involves not my rights alone, but the rights of those who may subsequently come to this body who may entertain opinions similar to my own.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I suppose the remarks which the Senator from Delaware has now made may be considered as foreshadowing the speech which he desires to make hereafter. Now, if I have been able to understand those remarks, they come under two heads: first, objections which may be called in the nature of objections of fact, referring to the origin of this act of Congress; and secondly, objections of law.

But it seems to me that the objections of fact which the Senator has made, so far as they may be regarded as shedding any light upon the origin of the statute in question, might properly be brought forward if there were any question of legislation, as, for instance, if it were proposed to introduce a new statute to amend or repeal the old one; but that they cannot have any weight when the question is whether the Senate shall obey an existing statute. I therefore think the Senator's objections of fact, so far as they have been developed, are not entitled to any weight.

Then what are his objections of law? Why, sir, precisely what this Senate discussed now nearly a year ago, and what it discussed on Friday last—nothing new, nothing different. And yet the Senator asks us to postpone the consideration of this question, in order to give him an opportunity of discoursing at length. Now, since there is nothing of fact to which he has referred which is justly pertinent to the existing question, and since there is nothing of law which is not already familiar to the Senate, I submit that there is really no occasion for any postponement, and that, considering the character of the question, and the long time that it has been before this body, we ought to proceed with its consideration at once, and to come to a vote.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts misapprehends entirely the object of my statement. I do desire a postponement of this question till I can have further time to prepare for the argument. I suppose the honorable Senator will perfectly well understand that a man may have investigated a question fairly and fully, and yet when he is to argue it and present his views in a matter which involves his action in contradiction to the majority of the body of which he is a member, he feels that there is a grave responsibility imposed on him; and it is not an unreasonable desire on his part to wish that a postponement should take place for the purpose of preparing for that argument, and for that purpose alone. I have no more desire to hold my seat in the Senate after the decision of this question, without taking that oath, than the Senator from Massachusetts can have; but I have my conscientious convictions.

I have made a statement of the facts, not with a view that they would prevent the law from being operative, but to show the course of legislation which led me to believe that this Senate had not arrived at any final conclusion in reference to the constitutionality of the law in question, or that, if they had, the conclusion was adverse to its constitutionality. That was the object of the statement—no more. As to the other two points, the points of law which are involved in the question of the obligatory character of this law upon members of Congress, one of them was debated cursorily, and only cursorily, the Senator from Massachusetts never having taken any part in that debate so far as I have been able to trace, and no other Senator in favor of its constitutionality, except the honorable Senator from Illinois; a vote was taken, and that vote decided against its constitutionality. Subsequently there was simply a vote on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference which embodied five or six amendments, most of which by the report of the committee were agreed to, and the Senate concurred in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to ask him a question. The pending motion is to postpone till to-morrow. Will that be satisfactory to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BAYARD. I shall not be ready to-morrow; and I thought my statement would have satisfied the Senate why I could not be ready to-morrow.

But a few words more: I do not wish to detain the Senate. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts is certainly under a misapprehension in supposing that these questions are familiar to the Senate. Most certainly, in the former discussion, when the bill was before the Senate anterior to its passage, no allusion was made to the second question, whether members of Congress were civil officers within the contemplation and language of the Constitution of the United States; and therefore, (whether excepted or not,) whether they could be included in a law which did not name them. No such question was made.

Mr. President, if it will suit the convenience of the Senate that I should go on, prepared or unprepared, of course I must go on. I should prefer a longer period to make preparation; but, if the Senate prefer, I shall go on with what I have to say, ready or not ready, on Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, it is difficult to resist an application from a Senator urged with so much determination as that of the Senator from Delaware; and yet I must say that I think his application is without precedent in this body. Never since I have been here have I known an application under such circumstances—where a Senator has had such ample and protracted time for preparation on a question which, I beg to say, is absolutely trivial.

The request is more inexcusable when it is considered that practically the substantial question which occupies his mind is whether he shall take this oath of loyalty. Permit me to say, sir, that a Senator who for nine months has had the opportunity of taking the oath of loyalty and has refused, does not come before this body with any strong claims for indulgence. He asks delay in obeying the law of the land; but the Senate owes it to itself to see that the law of the land which it has helped to establish is enforced.

If the Senate is disposed to allow the question to go over till to-morrow, that we may to-day proceed with the military bill, I shall not object to allow the Senator from Delaware that indulgence; but the Senate ought not to go so far as to allow this question to be thrown over the holidays. But it is obvious that the proposition of the Senator from Delaware points in that direction. I wish to have it decided before any Senators go to their homes for Christmas or for New Year's. The country expects it of us.

I say, therefore, if my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] is disposed to take up the military bill, I shall make no further objection. I understand now from my colleague that he does desire to take up the military bill. This is enough for me. But I wish the Senator from Delaware to take notice that to-morrow I shall deem it my duty to press the question to a vote. On such a question procrastination is kindred to disloyalty. It is a bad example to the country.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone the further consideration of the pending motion until to-morrow, and to proceed now to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTY AND PAY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 7) to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army.

It provides that there shall be paid, in such installments as the Secretary of War may determine, to such persons as have enlisted under the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated October 17, 1863, calling for three hundred thousand volunteers, and to such persons as may hereafter voluntarily enlist in the regular or volunteer service of the United States for the term of three years, the following bounties, namely: To veterans who have been in the military service of the United States for nine months, and have been honorably discharged, and to those veterans in service under enlistments for three or more years who may reenlist for three or more years or during the war in the companies or regiments to which they belong, and who may have at the date of such reenlistment less than one year to serve, $400; to all other persons, $300. The Secretary of War is to be authorized also to pay a premium not exceeding $25, under such regulations as he may deem expedient, for the enlistment of a veteran volunteer, and a premium of not more than $15 for the enlistment of any other volunteer; and the sum of $20,000,000 is to be appropriated by this act in payment of the bounties which it authorizes. From and after the 1st day of January, 1864, the pay per month of non-commissioned officers and privates in the regular Army and volunteer forces in the service of the United States is to be as follows: sergeant majors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $23; quartermaster sergeants of cavalry, $23; of artillery and infantry, $20; first sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $23; sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $19; sergeants of ordnance, sappers and miners and pontoniers, $34; corporals, $20; privates, first class, $18; second class, $16; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $17; chief buglers of cavalry, $23; buglers, $15; farrier and blacksmiths of cavalry, and artificers of artillery, $18; privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $16; principal musicians of artillery and infantry, $22; musicians of artillery and infantry, and musicians of sappers and miners and pontoniers, $14. All enlisted persons of African descent who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States are to have the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, and pay as soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service.

Whenever the President shall call upon the several States for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the exigencies of the country may require, the quota of each ward of a city, town, or township, or of a county, where the county is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, is to be, as nearly as possible, in proportion to the number of men therein liable to render military service, taking into account, as far as practicable, the number which has been previously furnished therefrom; and in ascertaining and filling such quota, there must be taken into account, as far as practicable, the number of men that have entered or may enter the naval service of the United States. Chaplains, when absent from duty by reason of wounds or sickness, are to be allowed full pay without rations, and half pay with rations during absence on leave occasioned by other causes; and chaplains who have been absent from duty by reason of wounds or sickness, are to be entitled to receive full pay without rations during such absence.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was in section one, line eight, after the word "may" to strike out "hereafter," and insert "prior to the 5th day of January, 1864," so that it would read, "prior to the 5th day of January, 1864, voluntarily enlist," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line sixteen, after the word "war," to strike out "in the companies or regiments to which they belong."

Mr. HARRIS. I am not in favor of striking out those words. In my judgment, one of the most promising features of the present day is the inclination of the regiments of three years' men to reenlist. They are beginning to do so pretty freely; and if there is anything which gives promise of success for the ensuing year, it is the fact that those regiments are about to reenlist. Now, sir, strike out this provision in this section, and you throw the whole matter open, and instead of reenlisting in their own organizations you will find that the soldiers now in the field who are authorized to reenlist will be going from the infantry to the artillery and to the cavalry, and scattering about and breaking up the present organizations. This, in my judgment, would be most disastrous to the Army. I hope, sir, that this feature will be left in the bill, and that it will be understood that those three years' men whose term is about expiring will reenlist in the same organizations in which they are now found. I regard this as a valuable feature of the bill, and I hope it will not be stricken out.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from New York will allow me to inquire, if that is kept in, what he will do with those veteran soldiers who have been in regiments which have been disbanded entirely?

Mr. HARRIS. Provision is made in a previous part of the section for them.

Mr. CLARK. I think it does not touch them at all.

Mr. WILSON. In the original bill as it was introduced, we confined the bounty to veteran soldiers reenlisting, to those reenlisting in their companies and regiments. I did it with some considerable reluctance, and after consulting with the Secretary of War. The committee, however, thought otherwise. The great object was to get men, and there are a great many men who are willing to reenlist who will not reenlist in their own companies or regiments. We had facts presented to us showing, in some cases, that there were two or three hundred men in a regiment that would not do it. Still, evils may grow out of striking out these words from the bill. Soldiers who are infantry soldiers may desire to go into the artillery or into the cavalry, and perhaps too many of them desire to go into those arms of the service, and in that respect it may make some little difficulty. Then it will occasion some movement from one part of the country to another. Men being in one section of the country may reenlist to go into a regiment several hundred miles away. That may add to the expense somewhat. That we shall obtain the reenlistment of more men by striking out these words, I have not a doubt. That it may put a heavier burden, more expense on the Government, and make some little disturbance of organizations, is admitted. I think the committee saw that; but they thought the object was to get men, and therefore they have moved to strike out this limitation. I am not strenuous about it myself, however.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, so far as I know the present condition of the Army, and the wishes and purposes of the three years' men—I speak particularly with reference to those from my own State—applications are being repeatedly made now for leave to return home for a short time upon condition of reenlistment, and there are many regiments of three years' men prepared to reenlist in the same organizations in which they are now found, upon condition that they have a brief furlough, and arrangements are being made for that; whereas if this provision is stricken out of this bill, and it is understood that they may reenlist in any organization they please, infantry, cavalry, artillery, the whole thing, in my judgment, will be very much endangered. It seems to me of great importance that the present organization of the regiments should be maintained, and my belief is that we shall secure more of these three years' men by retaining that organization than we shall by throwing it entirely open.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighteen of section one, after the word "persons," to insert "except as provided in the fifth section of this act;" and after the word "dollars," in line twenty, to insert:

"And after the 5th day of January, 1864, there shall be no bounties paid by the United States Government to substitutes, and none to enlisted or drafted men, except the bounty of $100 now provided by law;" so that the clause would then read:

To all other persons, except as provided in the fifth section of this act, $300; and after the 5th day of January, 1864, there shall be no bounties paid by the United States Government to substitutes, &c.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that by adding:

And there shall be paid to each person who shall enlist into the marine corps of the United States the sum of $300.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman hardly means that, because that would provide for paying $300 to the marine on his enlistment, when the others get but $100.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not mean that. I mean to put them on the same footing.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then say that they shall receive the same bounty as volunteers in the Army.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well; I will put it in that shape.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that the laws in relation to the Army and Navy should be kept separate and distinct. I do not like to vote on this amendment until I know the effect of it. What necessity is there for it in regard to enlistments in the marine corps? Is it not easier to get persons for the marine corps? The subjects, I think, should be kept separate and distinct. I hope the Senator from Iowa will defer his amendment, involving a very important question and a considerable sum of money, and propose to attach it to some bill relating to the Navy.

Mr. GRIMES. It has been my effort ever since I have been in the Senate to have the marine corps connected with one branch or the other of the public service, but I have never been able to succeed. Whenever the marine corps is on land it is governed by the laws regulating the Army of the United States, and the Army regulations exclusively pertain to it. The moment it goes afloat, it is governed by the naval laws and regulations of the United States. The officers and men in the marine corps of the United States receive the same pay, the same emoluments, are governed by the same laws, controlled by the same regulations, as the officers and men in the Army of the United States.

We are authorized by law to have three thousand five hundred marines. I believe we have somewhere in the neighborhood of one third that number. Congress has decided that it is necessary for the public interests that we should have three thousand five hundred. How are we going to be able to secure them if every man that is conscripted is put into the Army, and all the bounties that are paid for enlistments are paid to those who shall go into the Army?

I propose to add to this bill, which relates to bounties and pay of the Army, (with the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs,) a clause giving simply the same bounties to marine soldiers who shall enlist as is now given to volunteers in the Army of the United States. The Senate should remember, too, that marines, under our present system, get no prize money. The blockade vessels that have been fortunate, of late, in catching blockade runners have no marines on board. The marines are kept exclusively for fighting purposes on board the real ships-of-war; and one battalion of them, almost all there are now, are performing the duty of soldiers at Charleston, connected with the Army. It seems to me that there is no impropriety in attaching it to this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator inform me whether, if there happened to be a corps of marines on board a vessel that took a prize, they would not be entitled to prize money?

Mr. GRIMES. They would be, if they were on board.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then they are on the same footing as the mariners.

Mr. GRIMES. The only difference is that every mariner stands his chance of being shipped to a vessel on the blockade, and almost all of them are employed, at some time or other, on the blockade; but the marine soldiers are not put on board those vessels thus employed; they are used at navy-yards, they are used as infantry and connected with the Army, as at Charleston, and are used on the heavy fighting vessels; for instance, on the Pensacola, which stands as a fort in front of the city of New Orleans, dominating over the rebels in that city. If you desire to reenlist those men to man the Pensacola, how are you going to reenlist them when you give them a bounty for stepping ashore and enlisting into the Army, but refuse to give them bounty if they remain in the service in which they are employed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendment, as modified by the Senator from Iowa, will be read.

The Secretary read it.

Insert at the end of the amendment of the committee the following:

And there shall be paid to each person who shall enlist in the marine corps of the United States the same amount as shall be paid to each of the volunteers or soldiers of the Army.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I am particularly opposed to the proposition, but I wish to see if I understand it. As it strikes me, there is no particular difference between the marines and the sailors on board our ships-of-war. It may be that the marines do not stand quite as good a chance of prize money as some of the seamen do; but they stand an equally good chance with those sailors that are on board the same vessels with them.

There is a manifest difference between the naval and the military service. In the first place, the exposure in the Navy is not nearly so great. The military service is attended with very great exposure with reference to the health of the soldiers; and, as is well known, we lose more probably by disease than we do by being wounded or killed while in actual conflict. These sailors, &c., on board their vessels, and the marines, if they are employed in the navy-yards, have certainly very light work, have quarters or barracks provided for them, and are well taken care of. Then, again, there is the chance of prize money, which the soldiers do not have. Those considerations—the smaller degree of exposure, the greater degree of comfort which exists in the naval service particularly, and the chance of prize money which exists there, and which does not in the military service—have been held to make the great distinction between the two arms of the service with regard to bounty. If the Senate adopt this provision, that the bounties are to be paid to marines also, I do not see how they can very well avoid voting a bounty to all the sailors on board our ships-of-war, thus carrying the system into the naval service; and I presume that the Senator from Iowa, if he succeeds in this proposition, will make the other motion, predicated upon the ground that there is really no very great distinction between the two arms of the service.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; I do not propose to do any such thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, I am very glad the Senator does not propose to do any such thing. I presume he has considered the subject, and if he has come to the conclusion that the other proposition is not proper or necessary, so much the better; but for myself, I am not able to see any great difference. I do not know that I object to his amendment particularly, but I deem it advisable that the attention of members of the Senate should be called to it, and that they should understand the difference between the two arms of the service, and see in fact whether this necessity does apply to the marines. If it does, and we cannot get them in any other way, I shall not object to the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not going to say that the Senate and House of Representatives decided correctly when they decided that the public interest required the establishment of a marine corps to the extent of thirty-five hundred men. I find it to be the fact that they have so decided. Now the question is, how are we going to keep that marine corps full? You first say that you will offer inducements to all the men who can be induced to leave their homes and go into the public service, to go into the Army but not into the marine corps; and then such as cannot be induced by bounties to enter the public service you propose to conscript, and thus force them into the Army, and you leave nobody at all to go into the marine corps, either under the operation of your bounty laws or in consequence of your conscriptions.

The Senator says that he cannot conceive of the difference between the case of a seaman and the case of a marine. I thought I made that tolerably plain. The reason is, that almost every sailor at some time or other during the period of his enlistment is in a condition to participate in the profit arising from blockade captures, but hardly any marine soldier is ever in that condition during the whole time of his enlistment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then he must be on shore. Mr. GRIMES. He is on shore, to be sure; on shore, as a battalion of them are now, in the face of the enemy at Charleston, where they have been for months doing the same duty precisely as the soldiers to whom you propose to give a bounty; on shore as they were down at Port Hudson; on shore as they were at the first battle of Bull Run, where they did certainly as good service as any other portion of the United States Army. I have no particular interest in the marine corps—

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him what efforts, if any, are being made to recruit that branch of the service; whether there has been an attempt, and it has failed?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. I was called upon by the commandant of marines to-day, who told me it was absolutely necessary that this should be done in order to keep the corps reasonably full; and he told me that he called upon me with the advice and after consultation with other gentlemen connected with the department who thought it was necessary that something should be done in order to fill up the Army. I will state what the Senator already knows, I presume, that there is to-day, and has been during the whole summer and fall, a recruiting rendezvous in each one of the large cities, for the marine corps.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator says he expresses no opinion on the point whether or not the corps as provided by law is or is not unnecessarily large. I should like to have the Senator express his opinion on that point; because, if it is the fact that the corps is too large, it would be well to attach a proviso to this proposition, that the corps shall not exceed at any time so many men. I do not wish to give a bounty to raise a number of men whom we do not want, and who are unnecessary. The Senator unquestionably has an opinion on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think reflection will convince the Senator from Iowa that his amendment will be inoperative, for another reason: marines are not included in the proclamation referred to in this section—the proclamation of the President of the United States of October 17. This section limits the bounty to all who shall enlist before the 5th day of January.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After that we give a bounty to everybody.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of $100 only.

Mr. GRIMES. My amendment will give them only $100—that is all.

Mr. SHERMAN. But there might be some question or doubt about it. They would probably claim the bounty of $300, and ask to be put on the same footing with those in the military service. At any rate, I shall now say what I desire to say in regard to this section. I think—and, indeed, I believe we all think—that the assumption by the authorities of the power to give bounties was without law. It was probably the greatest stretch of power that has been exercised during this war. I do not know whether it was necessary or not. I think it was not necessary. I believe that if the authorities had in good faith, commencing last March, enforced the law which was provided for them according to the terms of the law, by the month of July they would have had the Army filled up. There is no doubt of it, in my judgment. They seem to have delayed action, to have put it off from day to day, showing timidity, anxiety, fear of the people; deterred at one moment by the mob in New York, at another by threatened political movements in other parts of the country; and finally, in October last, they fell upon the measure of offering bounties without law.

This section of the bill, if it passes, will, in my judgment, involve the expenditure of over one hundred million dollars. There are three hundred thousand soldiers called for. The bounty offered to veterans is $400 each; to other persons $300 each. Counting one hundred and fifty thousand, or one half the number required, as veterans—Senators can figure it up for themselves—and it amounts to over one hundred million dollars—an immediate demand on the Treasury of the United States. This money has not been paid out; no portion of it has been raised except the $12,000,000 paid in as commutation money. I ask Senators whether, under the present condition of affairs, they ought not to look a little into the subject before they legalize what may amount to an immediate demand on the Treasury of the United States for over one hundred million dollars.

I have made up my mind to acquiesce in the increase of the pay of the soldiers, because the increased price of living to their families renders it necessary to make that increase; but, in my judgment, this system of bounties was not necessary. I do not know that there is any hope of resisting it. I presume that the people of the United States, who have shown their trust and faith in the Government, will raise this money; but I believe it would have been wiser if the War Department had left the matter to the people at home. There is not a community in the United States where they have not voluntarily, by their own action, raised the necessary bounty. In some portions of the country, where there is an accumulation of wealth, as in Massachusetts, they gave very large bounties, and they raised them by the voluntary offerings of the people. In the West, where money is not so easily had, where the price of labor is not so high, the bounty is not so large, but it has been uniformly raised by the people through their own organizations, either by voluntary subscriptions, or by counties or States or communities. The little city in which I live has already raised by voluntary bounties every soldier demanded under this last draft, and the passage of this bill will not add one particle to their ability to make up their quota.

It seems to me, under the circumstances, we ought to hesitate a little about sanctioning this enormous bounty system. I shall vote for the bill in any shape it may assume, but I shall vote against this first section, because I believe the men could be raised by the fair enforcement of the conscription law with such amendments as the wisdom of Congress may devise, and without burdening the Treasury with the enormous demand of over one hundred million dollars. I know it is said—and the remark, I believe, has been made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON]—that the three hundred thousand men will not be raised by the 5th of January, and consequently all the bounty will not be paid, but the amendment proposed by the committee will save a large sum. In my judgment, a very large portion of the three hundred thousand men called for by the President in his proclamation of October last has already been raised, and this bill is the only legal authority that authorizes the payment of bounty to those that have been raised. Whether we can, under the circumstances, refuse to pay men who have enlisted on the faith of the proclamation is a different question. Perhaps we cannot refuse, because in a time of war we admit that the executive authorities must often exercise plenary powers, and go beyond the limits and terms of the law. I think there are cases of that kind where they may be justified by the necessity of the case. I do not believe, however, that this is such a case; but I think from a timidity, from a fear to enforce the law as it was prescribed by Congress, the executive authorities have made it necessary to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a large sum of money, which no doubt he may be able to raise, but it adds very much to the burden already thrown on that Department of the Government.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I think the passage of the first section of this bill, with the limitation put upon it, that it is only to continue till the 5th day of January next, will save money to the Treasury of the United States. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that the offer of these bounties by the Government was made without authority of law. The Government had no authority to offer bounties for any persons to enlist beyond the extent of the amount already received as commutation. But, sir, there had been a great deal of misrepresentation in the country in regard to the enrollment act, or conscription act, as some choose to call it. Its results as well as the act itself had been misrepresented. It was said to be a failure. Sir, it was not a failure. If not a great and eminent success, it was no failure. The Government made a draft of about one fifth of the persons enrolled between the ages of twenty and thirty-five years in some of the States. The Government undertook to raise a class of very perfect men. The Government said that in the volunteer service a great many men had been enlisted who had broken down after a few months' service, and that we ought to have nothing but perfect men. They made, I think, one hundred and twenty-four causes of exemption, and I undertake to say that any enrolling board could let off nearly every drafted man under these exemption clauses. About one fourth of all the persons drafted throughout the United States were held to service. About sixty thousand men were placed in the service, either as drafted men or as substitutes, and about forty thousand men paid the commutation, and the Government was authorized to offer bounties to that extent, which would raise forty thousand men, and no more.

The Government then, instead of going on and making another draft, in which, beyond all doubt, in drawing the same number of men, they would have obtained at least twice the number of soldiers or twice the amount of money obtained by the previous draft, called, on the 17th of October, for three hundred thousand men, promising to pay veterans a bounty of $400 and other persons $300. Supposing they obtained the men, one half from each class, here was a promise of $105,000,000 as bounties. The Government had then about nine million dollars paid in as commutation; the Government has now about twelve millions. That was all the money the Government had to pay the bounties promised.

Now, sir, the first section of this bill undertakes to legalize and to fulfill the pledge made by the Government to the people of the country and to the States. The proposition of the Government is limited to the 5th day of January next. The promise was that persons enlisting before that day, the 5th day of January, should have these bounties. We propose to accept the proposition and to fulfill the promise; but we propose to close it on that day and fall back upon the bounty of $100 for persons who are drafted or who volunteer after that day, not allowing it, however, to substitutes. We require the man who is drafted to pay the whole sum himself to get a substitute.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio that we ought to have great care in regard to our expenditures and to the condition of our Treasury. From the first hour of this war I have felt that our great danger, if we had any danger at all, was in obtaining money and not in obtaining men, and I am more convinced of that to-day than ever. As long as our currency is sound, as long as we can meet our obligations promptly, as long as the general business of the country is prosperous, we can maintain and prosecute this war. Had the Treasury failed, had the currency of the country broken down and interrupted the trade and productive industry of the country, then we should have had at once a strong opposition to the Government. The condition of the treasury of the confederate States is full evidence to the whole world that they must go down, that they cannot succeed. They are weaker in that than in their armies. I agree, therefore, with the Senator from Ohio that it is very important to be careful as to what sums, either for bounties or anything else, we pay in carrying on the war. It is important that we should be careful to keep the credit of the Government sound, the Treasury full, the currency solid, and the productive industry of the country prosperous.

The Senator says that, in his judgment, the larger portion of the three hundred thousand men called for by the proclamation of the President of October 17 have been raised. I think the Senator must be greatly mistaken. I do not believe that one third of the number have been raised, or that more than one third of the number will be raised by the 5th day of January next. The Government asks now for $20,000,000. That $20,000,000 will only pay the bounties for between fifty and sixty thousand men. It is said that we have expended the greater portion of the $12,000,000 derived from the commutation, and it is very important before the adjournment of Congress to give the Government this sum of $20,000,000, which it asks for, in order to pay the promised bounties. That is all they ask; and the opinion of the Secretary is that that sum will be sufficient up to the time indicated, the 5th of January. However, that is all a matter of judgment. It may be that between now and the 5th day of January there will be a great number of enlistments if this bill should pass in this form; but I believe we had better run that risk and fulfill to the States, and to the people of the country, and to the Army, the pledges made by the Government on the 17th day of October last. If we refuse to make this appropriation, the result will be that we have made promises which we have not fulfilled, and it will create dissatisfaction in the country. It is said that we have now men enlisted who have been enlisted for two or three weeks, and that there is no money appropriated to pay them. I think we had better fulfill the pledge of the Government, and to do it we must stand by the first section of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the debate which has sprung up does not really seem to me to be upon that amendment, but upon the question which has been raised between the Senator from Ohio and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Upon that question I desire to express the opinion that Congress ought to encourage volunteering, rather than to rely upon what, of necessity, must be an unpopular measure of the Government—the draft. I think we have had evidence enough in the country that the Army can be supplied with men by volunteering; and although the Senator from Massachusetts will not admit that the draft has been a failure thus far, he will hardly claim that it has been a success. Out of 125,000 drafted men, there went into the service about 6,000; about 20,000 paid the $300 commutation; and 37,394 were exempted for physical disability. The Senator says that the Department made a mistake in the number of causes of exemptions for physical disability. I am not prepared to discuss that question with the Senator. He is better informed on the subject, unquestionably, than I can be; but that is a very large exemption for physical causes. According to this report, there paid commutation money, 20,138; furnished substitutes, 10,402; failed to report, 17,940; exempted for other causes, about 32,319. Under the draft, therefore, in New England, Pennsylvania, New York, and perhaps a portion of Wisconsin, up to the 1st day of November, the Government realized about 6,000 troops who were drafted; 10,000 substitutes; and perhaps 20,000 volunteers, who were induced to volunteer under the policy adopted by the Administration in paying $300 bounty—the $300 that were paid by those who were drafted.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I think he included the State of Wisconsin in the list of those States which had made up this number. I believe that up to the 1st of November no draft had been made in any part of Wisconsin. That is my recollection about it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I dare say the Senator is right. I had an impression that there was one district, perhaps, in the State of Wisconsin in which a draft had been made prior to the 1st day of November. Then the draft was only enforced in part of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the District of Columbia; and this is the showing made by the report of the Provost Marshal General—that there were secured to the Government under the draft 6,000 men who were drafted, 10,000 substitutes, and perhaps 20,000 who were induced to volunteer by the $300 bounty that was paid in by the parties who were drafted and who did not go. Thus the draft up to the 1st of November resulted in securing to the service between 30,000 and 40,000 troops. Sir, can it be claimed as a success that out of 125,000 drafted men we secured but 6,000 men who were in fact drafted, 10,000 substitutes, and 20,000 volunteers who were encouraged to volunteer by the payment of $300 bounty? I think that cannot be claimed as a success.

But, sir, from the commencement of this war every effort on the part of the Administration to secure troops by appeals to the patriotism of the people, by appeals to their desire to provide for their families before they enter the service by giving them bounties, has been a success. At least, prior to the issuance of a proclamation by the President, which I shall not now discuss, there was no failure in the volunteer system. I claim that it was a success; and I may venture to say an army of volunteers is a better army than an army of conscripted men. They go freely, cheerfully, and they serve freely and cheerfully. You can hardly expect an army composed of men who are forced to go, when their interests will scarcely allow them to go, when the condition of their families will scarcely allow them to go, to be as valuable an army in the field as one made up of volunteers. I claim, therefore, that the effort on the part of the Government to obtain its troops by volunteering has been a success, and the effort to raise troops by draft has been a failure.

What then is the plain duty of Congress? With these facts before us, is it not our plain duty to undertake to fill up the Army by volunteering rather than by a draft? I do not ask that the draft law be repealed, for I know that such a motion in this body would not prevail; but it were better that it were repealed, in my judgment, and that the Government should pay liberal bounties to the soldiers in advance of their going into the field, in order that they might well provide for their families during their absence. It is proposed to give them $300 bounty up to the 5th day of January. At the proper time I intend to move to strike out that limitation of time. I say that it ought to be the permanent policy of the Government to fill up the Army by volunteers and not by drafted men, and my votes on this subject shall be governed by that policy.

Senators have criticised the course of the Administration in offering this bounty of $300. Of course I am not going to say that the Department did right in offering a bounty of $300 beyond the amount of money received from those who paid commutation money instead of going into the service under the draft, for in that they did not act according to law; but the purpose of the Administration was right, and that purpose of the Administration Congress ought to indorse by giving liberal bounties, instead of enforcing what must be an unpopular law in the country—the drafting law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, in looking at that amendment as modified, I am inclined to think it does not express the idea of the Senator from Iowa, though I am not certain about that. I am inclined to think that, as modified, the amendment would authorize any veteran to enlist into the marine service and receive his $400 any time before the 5th of January. I understood the Senator to disclaim any such purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no such purpose. I do not think there are many veterans who will enlist under this law, or that the law will pass before then.

Mr. HOWE. It strikes me if the Senator means to limit the bounty to $100, he had better say so.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well; make it to suit yourself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have not much expectation that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs will be changed by the Senate; but I am at a loss to understand the policy which has governed the committee in reporting some of the provisions of this bill. The bill as it now stands might very properly be called "a bill to stop all recruiting after the 5th day of January next." If that is the policy of the Committee on Military Affairs, they have reported a bill which will carry out their wishes. Does any Senator suppose that after the Government shall have stopped paying this bounty of $300 offered by the proclamation of the 17th of October, any citizen disposed to enter the Army will enlist? After bounties of $300 and $400 have been offered, $400 to veterans and $300 to other citizens, and that has been withdrawn, will there be any volunteering after that? I apprehend the Committee on Military Affairs does not expect it. Their policy, therefore, seems to be to stop recruiting after the 5th day of January. I am opposed to that policy. I agree with the Senator from Indiana, that it is far better that we should fill up our Army with volunteers, if it be possible. If it be not possible, then I say draft, but first let us try volunteering.

The Senator from Ohio has criticised the conduct of the Government in offering these large bounties on the 17th of October last. Sir, I think, if any one measure that has been adopted by the Government recently has met with general approbation, it is that measure. The Government had in hand some twelve million dollars received from commutation money. What was to be done with it? How was it to be appropriated? Of course to the raising of soldiers. And how was that to be effected? By offering a bounty. If by offering the same bounty the drafted men had paid as commutation the Government have done wrong, I am unable to perceive it.

But it is said the bounties that they offered amounted to a larger sum than the amount of the commutation money. Well, sir, if that be so, it is the good fortune of the country that it has furnished us with more soldiers than the number of drafted men who paid their commutation. In my judgment, if by going on with this system of recruiting we could expend $100,000,000 in raising three hundred thousand men by the 1st of March next, so that on the 1st of March we could send into the field an army of three hundred thousand men, it would be the best possible investment which this Government could make. Is there a Senator here who would not to-day cheerfully vote to pay $100,000,000 for an army of three hundred thousand men to be put in the field on the 1st of March? I apprehend there is not a patriotic man in the country who would not indorse such an appropriation as that; and yet the effect of this bill is to stop just that process on the 5th of January. Sir, I am opposed to the whole policy of this measure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I agree measurably with what was said by the Senator from Ohio. I believe there has been rather a mistake in the policy of the authorities with reference to this subject, and a mistake, too, on our part. I believe that the continued offer of bounties, and the continued increase of bounties—and they have been increasing almost geometrically from the beginning—instead of having a tendency to increase and promote the patriotism of the people, has had a tendency to diminish and destroy it. The effect has been, in my judgment, carried on at such a rate as it has been, especially in my section of country, to turn the attention of the people from the fact and the consideration that every man owed to the Government when necessary his personal service, which as a citizen he was bound to render, to the question, "how much can we make by holding off a little longer before we volunteer?" And the system, as now proclaimed, going on as it does, must necessarily be one that increases and enlarges from day to day.

We began by calling for seventy-five thousand volunteers. That was the President's first call. They were furnished readily, for the patriotism of the country was awakened. Nobody thought of paying a bounty at that time, except, perhaps, a month's additional pay, or something of that kind. The time came, and came very soon, when a certain other large number was called for. The bounty was then increased. There was no difficulty then, although the bounty was small, in filling up the ranks of the Army. Naturally there would be more difficulty on that subject the longer a war lasts. As a matter of course, as people become more acquainted with the hardships of campaigning, and see the difficulties before them, there will be more trouble in raising troops. But what has been the course adopted in my section of the country? The moment a certain number of men are called for, one set of politicians, thinking to make something out of it, says, "why, these poor fellows must have so much bounty; they ought not to go unless they are paid so much." Another set of politicians, not to be outdone, says, "that is not enough; we will go a little further." In fact, the question how much bounty should be raised has been carried into party politics, and politicians have vied with each other as to which should be the loudest in calling for bounties. The result has been that we have discarded the really patriotic feeling at the bottom, which would have given us men enough had we adhered to any regular system, and put the matter upon the right ground and the correct principle from the beginning, and that is, that every man who is able to render it owes his personal service to the country in its hour of peril, and every one has had his attention called off to the question of how much he can get if he waits a little longer before he enlists. That has been the result and the effect of it. There was patriotism enough to begin with, and there is patriotism enough among our soldiers and our citizens now, but we are eternally prating upon this question of how we shall accomplish this thing.

Now, sir, although it will operate hardly upon many persons, unquestionably, yet the only question, or the great question, after all, is, what can the country engaged in this struggle bear? That is the first question. How much can it bear? After all, it comes back to where my friend from Massachusetts placed it, how long and how much can we pay to carry on this war? How long can we sustain the credit of the Government, and how long will the people be able to bear these burdens? How long will their patriotism last under them? I trust they would be willing to bear them as long as there is a dollar or a man left, and I believe they would; but, after all, a wise Government looks at the question, what is the capacity of the Government to sustain and conduct a conflict? That being ascertained, and we being called upon to operate and act within the limits of that capacity, the next question is, how shall we equalize the burden? How shall we render it equal upon the community? It is not rendering it equal by running a race of bounties in one section and another, to see how much each section, or each State, or each division, or each town, would pay to accomplish this purpose or that; but what is equal? Sir, I have held almost from the beginning the unpopular doctrine that the sooner we pass a fair law providing for a draft, when soldiers were wanted, the better, and the closer we adhered to it after we had passed it the better still. A draft operates equally upon all. If it becomes my turn in the revolution of the wheel to go into the field, I must go, or procure somebody to go in my stead, if the law allows me to do it. It may be hard upon me, but it is fair. I say again distinctly, and I call the attention of Senators to it, that we have lost ground in the country, and our patriotism has been cooled, by the effort to put down the idea which lies at the bottom of all, and that is, that no man has a right to refuse his personal service when it is called for by the country. That is the proper system and principle, which we should always stand by.

But, sir, we have adopted the principle of paying bounties and of bidding bounties to induce men who are able to serve their country to enlist. The question then is, not with what we are to begin, but how far we are to go, and that returns upon us. It is not a trifling consideration whether we are to pay $100,000,000 more or less this week, and $100,000,000 six months hence, and another $100,000,000 twelve months hence. It is very easy to stand here and talk about what the system should be; that it should be to offer bounties. It is another question to raise the money to pay them; and I ask my friend from New York, who is a financier, if he is able to tell me how long we may go on at the rate of a thousand millions a year, and the country will be content with it. He has undoubtedly considered such a question, and perhaps can answer me; but it is a point upon which I am in the dark. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that at the end of the coming fiscal year we shall be indebted something over $2,000,000,000. Is the war to end then? I pray God it may, and before that time, and I trust it will; but suppose it does not. How long can we continue it? As I said before, I believe we can continue longer than any other Government and any other people on the face of the earth could, and that such is the spirit of our people that they would do so; but after all, we, as legislators, are bound to consider those questions, and what is to be the result.

I believe with my friend from Ohio, if I understood him rightly, that the Government should adhere to the law. We provided for a draft of so many men, and we provided an exemption clause, on the payment of a certain sum of money, for the purpose of enabling the Government to supply the places of those who paid that commutation. So far as money was paid in for that purpose, the Government had a right to apply it for bounties. They reasoned in this way, I suppose—it is the excuse I make for them—"if we do not succeed in getting the number required, enough will pay commutation to make up the difference, and therefore we run no risk in making the offer, because it will be paid out of this commutation money;" but they did not make their figures right. They got a great many more men who were to be paid bounties than they got of men who paid the exemption; and that is precisely the difficulty now, and precisely the reason why there is a large sum of money due or promised and nothing to pay it with.

Well, sir, that was an oversight; but what did they do? They made the offer. The result has been that men have gone into the service. They were promised by the executive authorities—not by our permission, not with our permission, yet acting unquestionably in good faith, and doing what they supposed to be the best thing they could do—a given sum of money, and they have enlisted. Now, what do you propose to do? You must pay that sum, or, if you are honest men, you must discharge them from their enlistment—one or the other you ought to do. We cannot, with any sense of justice between man and man, accede to any such doctrine as that we may make a promise to men to enlist and then hold them to service without performing our promise. We must therefore pay what has been promised.

The question then arises, do you mean to keep up that system and abandon your law? The law either ought to be enforced or abandoned. We ought to have a draft or else strike the law from our statute-book. We adopted the policy. Why? Because we foresaw that after this war had continued so long the result would be that we should find it difficult to obtain men. With all the patriotism that exists in the community, when it comes to the individual case it is found hard to raise the number of men required. Now, will you abandon at once the idea, and say to the people that you have abandoned it; that there is no such thing in the United States of America as an obligation resting on every able-bodied citizen to serve his country, when his country needs his services? Sir, we cannot do so. It is the idea upon which that law was predicated, upon which it was passed, to give the Government the power to command the services of our citizens; and, in my judgment, it should be enforced. Spend the money you get from exemptions in bounties for the purpose of filling up the ranks; but, sir, there is no seeing how long the credit of this country can continue what it is if we are to go on recklessly and spend money as if we had a profusion of it and more than we knew what to do with. If gentlemen will take charge of the Treasury Department and provide the funds and make the people easy on the subject, they may offer just as much bounty as they please for volunteering.

I do not undertake to say that the draft, so far as it has gone, has been a success exactly. I do not think it has; but I think its want of success has been owing to the blundering manner in which it was attempted to be carried out, rather than to anything in the law itself. It may be found, more than anything else, in what was alleged by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts—in the fact that there was such a list of causes of exemption from service that it was exceedingly difficult to find anybody who did not come within some provision of them.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator if he knows why, after the first drawing had failed to fill the quota, there was not another drawing to fill it up afterwards; and whether, if there had been one, they might not have raised money enough to redeem the pledges of the Government to pay these bounties?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I really do not know anything about it. I do not know what process of reasoning the Government went through. I suppose that it might possibly be because the Democracy, as they call themselves—and I call them what they call themselves—had made such an—I was about to say an infernal howl about the draft in order to frighten the people, that they frightened the Government; but I think the Government, after it had found out that the people were not at all frightened, but were willing to sustain it, should have recovered their courage and gone on with the draft. That is my opinion. I may be all wrong about the logic and cause of it, but I think that is it.

Now, sir, I repeat what I said before; that, in my judgment, the failure of the draft, so far as it has been a failure, has been owing to the very clumsy manner in which the thing was attempted to be carried out, arising out of these exemptions for cause more than anything else. I know it was so in my section of the country, and that the boards were compelled to discharge able-bodied men, under those rules thus made, and did so, and said they were compelled to discharge able-bodied men who were fit to go into the field, because they had some little defect which did not impair their efficiency as soldiers in a very great degree. My opinion is that they should have repealed their rules, made a better set of regulations, and gone on with the law. It is not their business—and I say it to the executive Government—and to the people—to say whether a law is good, bad, or indifferent; whether it works well or otherwise. Their business and duty is to proceed under it, and not to adopt a new system which is not provided for by law at all. I give all credit to the motive, to the intention; it was done with the very best; on the idea that we must have these men, and we must take a shorter way to get them. I sustain the Government thoroughly in all its acts; although they may make mistakes, for I believe they arise from a devotion to the true interests of the country, and a desire to accomplish the great purpose which we all have so much at heart. I do not undertake to quarrel with them; but I say that the duty of the Government is in all cases to carry out the law as it is made; and if Congress says they are to raise men in a given way, let them take that way, or wait, if it is possible to wait, until Congress shall say in its turn that they have provided or will provide a better.

I say therefore, sir, that I shall vote for this provision as a matter of course. We must discharge our obligations to these men that are already enlisted, or discharge the men themselves, if we will act fairly; but, sir, if this war is to continue, I do not believe that the country can sustain itself by a system of constantly increasing bounties to induce men to enter into the service of the Government, and by trying all we can to make our people forget that there is a first high duty, next to their duty to God, and a part of their duty to God; and that is, to render their services to the country when the country demands them; but every man should stand upon equal ground, and have a fair chance with his neighbors with regard to it, and when that is done all is done.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The motion pending before the Senate, I believe, is to add a clause to the first section of the bill providing that after the 5th of January this increased bounty to your soldiers shall cease.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion. Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, there are but two modes of raising an army: one is by volunteering, and the other by a draft. It seems to me that much of the difficulty of our situation has been incurred by attempting to carry on at the same time two systems independent of each other, and in some respects antagonistic to each other. The very theory upon which the conscription bill of the last session was passed was that by voluntary enlistments the Army could not be filled in sufficient numbers and with sufficient promptitude. Upon that basis the conscription act of the last session was passed—that the volunteer system would not fill your armies in time to meet the public emergencies, and hence it was deemed necessary to resort to the draft.

Much has been said in reference to the operation of that draft and to the $300 exemption clause under it. If you rely upon the system of volunteering alone, then you should offer sufficient bounties to induce the voluntary enlistment of soldiers in the Army of the United States; but if you rely upon the draft, then it seems to me you should carry it out; but both systems cannot be carried on at the same time, for at every point they antagonize with each other. What has been the effect of this $300 exemption clause? The conscription act was passed as a military measure to raise men, and not as a financial measure. It is considered here mainly as a financial measure, as it seems to me. In other words, it is said that although it did not bring men into the service, it brought money into the Treasury. We need men more than money. If we could print soldiers as fast as we can print greenbacks, there would be something in this argument; but it cannot be done.

What was the effect of this conscription law, and how has it been successful or unsuccessful? Under that conscription law any man drafted or prior to the draft could procure an exemption by paying $300. That fund, by the provisions of the law, the Secretary of War was authorized to apply to the enlistment of soldiers, or, under the terms of the law, as I think, to hire substitutes. It is said, and upon very high authority, and I have no doubt truly said, that under the operation of the conscription law some $12,000,000 have been brought into the Treasury; and it is furthermore said that the Government has lost nothing in men, because for every $300 paid as commutation a soldier has been brought into the service. That, I apprehend, is not founded in fact. I have high authority, nay more, the very highest authority, for saying that such is not the fact. Of the $12,000,000 paid in as commutation money, more than two thirds of that sum now remain in the hands of the Secretary of War, to be administered under the direction of the Provost Marshal General; so that they have really received but one third of the men which the $12,000,000 would hire at $300 per man. This $300 exemption, as it seems to me, operates in this wise simply: to raise money to the Treasury upon the enforcement of the draft, and not to bring the drafted men into the service of the country; for no man who can raise the $300 will go into the service, and there are very few who by themselves or friends cannot raise the $300 exemption. In addition to that, many cities, towns, and townships have entertained seriously the proposition of taxing the whole people to raise the $300, so as to buy off the whole quota under the conscription law. If this $300 exemption clause is suffered to remain in any conscription law, I promise you that you will get but few soldiers under it in the future, as you have in the past.

It was said, and I have no doubt the law was passed with that view, that the $300 exemption clause was passed for the benefit of the poor man, and therefore any poor man who could raise the $300 was not compelled to go into the service. The operation of that clause has been not in favor of the poor man, because the poor man had to go at all events; he could not raise the $300; but it has operated, perhaps, beneficially upon the middle classes, and has exempted the rich entirely, for they could all pay the $300 exemption. At the time the law was passed there was much objection made to that clause in the Senate, and much objection throughout the country. It was held up as an odious feature, a discrimination in favor of the rich and against the poor. That, I have no doubt, was utterly unfounded and false; and yet it was used to create an odium against this law, and in many instances such an odium as almost to prevent its execution in many districts of the United States; so much so that in my own State one of the best and purest men upon earth was assassinated in his attempt to execute this law. This provision was denounced throughout the whole country as an odious law, as class legislation in favor of the rich and against the poor; and, strange to say, many of the very men who denounced that $300 exemption clause are now engaged in denouncing the repeal of that clause all over the country.

But, Mr. President, suppose we resort to a draft alone, and retain the $300 exemption clause. I show you that we cannot, by any possibility, raise an army under any system of draft which retains that clause. We cannot fill our armies under any conscription law which retains the $300 exemption clause. If we rely upon volunteering alone, we may, and perhaps will, fill our armies; but it is just, is it fair and honest to the whole people, that the loyal, the true, the patriotic, the Union-loving shall be called again and again to volunteer and to shed their blood in defense of the flag, and to find martyrs' graves upon the battle-field, while the disloyal, the traitorous, and the sympathizers with treason refuse to go into the Army, and remain at home to denounce every measure of the Administration calculated to suppress the rebellion? It is time that the people, and the whole people, should be called upon to defend the country in this hour of its extremest need and peril.

Now, sir, what is to be the result of a draft, supposing we resort to it? If we take an arithmetical view of this question, what have we? Under the last draft, when the enrollment shall have been completed, in round numbers there are three million men subject to draft in the country. The proportion of men held to service, exempted, &c., in the late draft, will perhaps hold good through any subsequent draft. Under the late draft, one third were rejected as physically and mentally unfit for service. There goes one third of your three millions. One third were exempted under the second section of the act in reference to unsuitableness of age, &c. There are two thirds stricken from your enrollment, the other third being held by the boards of enrollment as subject to military duty. This reduces our capital to draw from to only one million men. Now what becomes of it? Taking the experience of the draft so far as it has been enforced, only one seventh of the million is held to personal service; two sevenths furnish substitutes, pay commutation money, &c.; that is to say, if we draft all the men in the nation, we shall have only the following result: original drafted men put in service, 142,000; substitutes, 284,000. The total number of men that we can get from the whole nation under the present law, with its most rigid enforcement, is only 426,000; exempted by the commutation clause, 568,000, taking the proportion of men who have paid commutation with those who have gone into the service. It is therefore seen that, after all the labor, and vexation, and expense of drafting and examining the whole nation, we will at last get but 426,000 men, and not that, for a large proportion of these men do not report for duty, and are reported as deserters. Perhaps some 20,000 or 30,000 out of this number would be a fair proportion for those who would be reported as deserters.

The present law allows but one surgeon in a congressional district. Supposing each district to consist of ten thousand men, and remembering that the examination of one hundred men a day is the largest amount of work a surgeon can possibly do, and that after being examined himself, the drafted man may have his substitute also examined, and that Sundays are counted out, and the exact number will not always be in readiness for a full day's work, it will be found that it will take more than one year to get through with the physical examination alone under the present law. We wish an army in the field, and in the field immediately, and not at the end of one year. If this law is not amended, and if you intend to carry it out as it stands, it will take more than one year to go through with the examinations alone which you provide for in your bill. At the end of the year we find that we have got four hundred and twenty-six thousand men, less the number who may be reported as deserters; but the astounding fact is also found that to all who furnish substitutes, or who have paid commutation money, six sevenths of the million men in the country ascertained to be fit for duty have been granted certificates giving a pledge that the Government will not call upon them for military service for three years. If this law is enforced, and the war is to last more than one year—which God forbid—you will find that your draft leaves you standing without an army. Then you must rely, as it seems to me, upon a rigid enforcement and the most rigid enforcement of the draft law; and there is nothing unequal in it, nothing improper in it.

Mr. President, I am proud to make the avowal which I now do, that the State of Indiana, from the very moment the rebellion commenced, has been in advance of her quota. Every single call has been answered, and promptly answered, and more than answered. It is true that in the fall of 1862 we had a draft in Indiana, carried on under the auspices and direction of our able and efficient Governor, for some four thousand men; but at the same time, by a letter from the Secretary of War, it is shown that we were two thousand in excess of our quota at that time; but our Governor, from patriotic motives, did not choose at that time to raise the question. We have been in advance of every draft and every quota; and let this bill fail or let it pass, I am proud to assure the Senate that there will in all probability be no draft in the State of Indiana even under the last call; that prior to the 5th of January, when you propose that this law shall go into operation, Indiana, by voluntary enlistment, will have filled her full quota. I have no doubt of it.

But, sir, the operation of the $300 exemption clause upon volunteering in our State is found to be just this: those who are indisposed to go into the Army, as long as they can shield themselves under the $300 exemption clause will not volunteer. If you repeal that clause, there is an additional inducement held out to them to go into the service of the country. I understand that when notice was given in the Senate of the intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal that clause, volunteering was wonderfully accelerated in that State. It was thought that within one week the whole list would be filled up; but when some busy telegrapher telegraphed to the West what I doubt not is untrue, that that clause would not be repealed, that moment volunteering ceased.

I ask you then either to carry out the conscription law in its terms, or to abandon it altogether and rely upon volunteering. Those two systems do not harmonize; they do not go together. You must make sufficient inducements by bounties and increased pay to fill up your armies by volunteering, or you must fall back upon the draft. I believe that from the beginning the draft would have been the more just, the more economical, and the more proper way of filling your armies. So far as the proud State which I in part represent is concerned, I have only this to say, that under any and all circumstances she will fill her quota, whether you decide for a draft or for volunteering. In either event, her quota will be filled as required by the President and the Secretary of War.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask my honorable friend from Indiana a question. He belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs, and is a very faithful and able member of that committee. The question I ask the honorable Senator is this: if there was a clause introduced in this or some other bill that every office-seeker should be conscripted into the Army, would it not raise a very considerable force?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have no doubt that my distinguished friend speaks more particularly in reference to Kentucky, and I doubt not the number of our forces would be greatly increased, if the Commonwealth of Kentucky was embraced. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. How would it be if my honorable friend included Massachusetts?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Perhaps with Massachusetts it would work well; but in Indiana we have no office-seekers; they have all gone into the Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator from Indiana, he has struck the point. It was in special reference to some men in Kentucky who are coming on or sending to this city to sell themselves for office, that I directed my inquiry to him.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to inquire whether the pending question is to strike out or to adopt the clause at the end of the first section?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on inserting the words in italics.

Mr. HOWE. From the twentieth line?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on inserting all the words printed in italics at the end of the section.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir, I understand it. So much of this section, then, as precedes the word "dollars," in the twentieth line, I suppose to be absolutely necessary to enable the Government to settle up fairly and honorably with men who have been enlisted into the service during the past summer and fall; and I agree with the Senator from Maine, that we have no honorable way of evading the provisions contained in that part of the section. I am in hopes that the amendment proposed in the latter part of the section will not be adopted at present. I have listened to the debate, so far as it has proceeded, with a great deal of interest, and I would not add a word to it but for the fact that I have considered this subject considerably, and I have a view which has not yet been suggested by any Senator, and therefore I suppose it is one that no Senator entertains, and perhaps that no Senator will entertain.

The Senator from Maine has announced a principle here which I welcome with my whole heart, as it is about the first distinct enunciation of it I have heard in the Senate of the United States since I have had the honor of a seat here. I was particularly gratified with it. It was this, that every citizen of this Republic owes to its Government the utmost of his ability for the maintenance of the Government during this war, whether of money or of personal service. It is not a matter of choice, but it is a matter of duty. It is a debt due, and it ought to be paid, and the Government, as the agent of the whole people, ought to insist on the payment of it. I am glad to hear that doctrine. It is a very late day to proclaim it. It is not exactly the first enunciation of it made in the United States. I think General Butler intimated some such principle as that during his administration of affairs in the city of New Orleans. I offered myself, Mr. President, allow me to say, a year ago, to incorporate a modification of that principle in a bill which I had the honor of introducing here, and which had the honor of getting referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and which had the honor of dying there. I have never heard from it since. But other departments of the Government, I believe, have acted on a very different principle, to wit: upon the principle that it was a mere matter of choice on the part of any one and every one, whether he would fight for the Republic or fight against it; whether he would support it or oppose it; stand by it or stand against it; and so far have they carried that principle in some departments of the Government, that you have seen repeatedly, during the progress of this war, our military commanders, in districts in rebellion against the Government of the United States, calling citizens of the United States up before them, one after the other, and proposing to them to declare for or against us, inviting them to take an oath in accordance with their duty to this Government, submitting it to their choice, giving them the utmost freedom of election. If they took the oath and professed their allegiance to the Government, it has been administered, and they have been received into full fellowship. If they refused to take that oath, but preferred to declare their friendship and their allegiance to that government, or that pretended government, which is in arms against the Government of the United States, they have been sent forward at our expense to reinforce the armies of our enemies, and to make war against us. That has been done, not in individual instances only, but it has been done with hundreds and hundreds from New Orleans, from Memphis, from every point on the Mississippi between the two, where our armies have taken possession.

During the very last summer it happened that a very distinguished citizen of the State of Ohio declared that he had not the slightest disposition, the slightest intention, to pay allegiance to the Government of the United States, and the Government became satisfied that he told the truth in that instance, and they sent him down within the rebel lines. I believe they did not actually take him into the army; they thought they had a better use for him, and they sent him back to our other frontier.

Now, I hold that this duty thus announced by the Senator from Maine is one resting with primal force upon every citizen of the United States, and it is the first duty of the Government of the United States to enforce that duty, and not to relax in reference to any one citizen. The man who professes a willingness to pay that debt, and pay it promptly and cheerfully, is a loyal citizen of the United States and should be treated as such, and have all his rights and all his protections under its Government. The man who does not profess it, or professes the contrary, is the enemy of the United States, and should be treated as the enemy of the United States by the Government and by all its agents.

But now, sir, if this is a correct principle—and I do not think it will be controverted here when it is once stated as clearly and as forcibly as it has been by the Senator from Maine—this follows, that whether you want an army of five hundred thousand or five million of men, it is the duty of every man to contribute to the composition of that army equally in proportion to his ability. How shall that be done? The Senator from Indiana has argued that the most popular if not the most equitable (I think he said the most equitable) way of doing it was to leave it to the choice of every man whether he would become a soldier in that army or not. Now, I must differ from that proposition. I do not think it is the most equitable, and I do not think it is the most popular method of raising an army. We have seen both methods tried, and that has proved the most successful, I am very willing to admit, so far; but it has had the most thorough trial; the latter method has not had a thorough trial by any means, not even a fair one.

I think that the first is not the most equitable. I suppose every Senator on this floor has witnessed the efforts made to fill the calls for volunteers which have been made by the Executive during the past years of this war, and you have seen how far those efforts have been equally distributed among the people of your several communities. I dare say there is not a Senator here whose observation has not corresponded with mine to this extent, that while he has seen men unfavorably circumstanced so far as worldly fortune is concerned, men of small means, men with families dependent upon them, men having as many ties to home as any others in the community, severing all these ties and stepping into the ranks of the Army as soldiers of the Union promptly and cheerfully and ungrudgingly; and he has seen other men, under no sort of legal obligation by reason of age or of disability to enter the military service of the United States, contributing liberally, largely, bountifully, from their means to induce others to go into the Army, or to support the families of those who did go; he has also seen other men, able-bodied and single men of large means, who not only would not enlist as soldiers, but who constantly and obstinately refused, time and again, and continually, to contribute a dime to encourage anybody else to go.

I think every Senator here has witnessed all these things; and I think every Senator here has heard complaints because of them. Generous men, brave men, patriotic men, have bled freely and cheerfully; but illiberal men, unjust men, and sneaks have not bled at all. So that the operation of the volunteer system has not been equitable. I do not think it is so equitable as the system proposed in the law we enacted last winter.

The Senator from Indiana says that however that may be, it has been more popular. I respectfully submit that he is mistaken on that point also. Up to last winter we had tried no other expedient to fill up our armies but that of volunteering. We had tried no other expedient up to the time the elections were held in the fall of 1862. The result of those elections did not declare the utmost satisfaction on the part of the people of the United States, either with the war or with our mode of carrying it on. During the last winter we changed that system; we announced, in a modified form, the principle to-day declared by the Senator from Maine, that it was the duty of every man to step forward at the call of his Government and to defend the flag of the Union; and since that law was enacted, we have had other elections throughout all these States, the results of which the Senator from Indiana will agree with me have signified that at least the people are much better satisfied with the mode of conducting this war than they were the year before. So I conclude from this evidence that the last mode of filling up the armies of the United States is a more popular as well as a more equitable one than that which we tried before.

But I cannot quite coincide with the opinion submitted here by the Senator from Maine, that a draft, an inexorable, inflexible lottery among all the men of the country of certain classes, is a strictly equitable mode of executing the principle which he has announced, and to which I assent. I say that it does not operate equitably; it does not operate equally and justly. You must take communities as they stand. You will have seen under the draft just made, in some instances every member of a business firm doing a large amount of business, amounting to thousands per year, drafted into the Army. Now, if it is made a duty by law for them to leave their business and to step into the ranks, and there is no mode whatever of avoiding that obligation, what is the effect upon them? That business is destroyed, at a sacrifice of thousands and thousands per annum to that firm.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will understand me. I did not attempt to define what should be the particular provisions. I did not declare myself as opposed to the idea of receiving substitutes. On the contrary, I believe that should always be allowed. I expressed no opinion on the subject of paying money for exemption. That question I have not sufficiently considered to vote upon it now. I spoke of the general system, without proper limitations, of course.

Mr. HOWE. I am entirely in accord with the Senator in reference to the merits of the system as a general system; but if I was mistaken as to the particular view submitted by the Senator from Maine, I think that view has been submitted by other Senators; I am not sure but that the Senator from Indiana enforced it in the remarks he has just submitted to the Senate.

While in such cases as those to which I have just alluded the draft operates disastrously, you must know that every man in the United States is not so fortunately circumstanced. Unfortunately for the country, there are a great many men in the United States who cannot earn $1,000 a year if left to attend to their own business and to employ their own judgments, their own intellects, and their own capacities. Unfortunately, there is a class of men who could do better for themselves pecuniarily, and better for their families pecuniarily, by entering into the service of the United States for reasonable pay, in its armies, than they could do at home in the unrestricted and free use of their own faculties. Now, what has been the real difficulty with this $300 exemption clause? As I conceive, it has been this: there were a great many men drafted under the law who could not raise the $300, and they got no benefit from the payment of the $300 by those who did pay it. The lot fell upon them. They had no inducement to go into the Army except the payment of thirteen dollars per month, and the bounty of $100 which I think was continued to men drafted. That was all the inducement. Wages had increased. It was a sacrifice to them to accept this service upon these terms; but the law gave them no alternative except that of paying the $300, and that they could not avail themselves of by reason of their poverty; whereas they saw men right above them who could leave their homes with less detriment than they could, who were better able to leave home, who had fewer ties binding them to home, but who had a fortune which enabled them to avail themselves of this $300 clause by the payment of $300; and under the construction placed upon it by the War Office, they were allowed to pay $300 into the Treasury, and were thus exempted from all military service for three years, while the less fortunate neighbor, not being able to raise the $300, was obliged to go into the service and serve three years for thirteen dollars a month.

That has seemed to me to be the real difficulty, and it has seemed to me that it might be avoided to a great extent, perhaps not to the full extent, by providing for the exemption of those who are willing to contribute money and prefer to contribute money rather than personal service, and at the same time lighten the burden which falls on those who must give service because they have not the money. The provision which I would make is this: allow any man to be exempted on the payment of $300, if that is thought to be the proper sum, but allow him only to be exempted from service under the draft for which he pays the $300, and do not place that money in the hands of the Government to buy substitutes, but let it constitute a fund to be distributed equally among those who do choose to go into service under the draft.

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question? Has the War Department decided that by payment of $300 commutation money the person paying it is exempt for the term for which the men were called out under that draft, or only for that drawing itself?

Mr. HOWE. I understand that they have made three decisions. First they decided that the payment of the $300 exempted a man from service during the term for which the draft was made. On revision of the subject, they decided that it exempted only from the particular draft; and on a re-revision of it, they reaffirmed their first decision, and so I understand stands the law as construed by the Department at the present day. I do not understand this from any authentic source, perhaps.

Mr. COWAN. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will say that the decision, as I understand it, is only that the party is exempted from service under that call. The President called for three hundred thousand men. Until that number is raised and another call made for other three hundred thousand men, the party paying the commutation money is exempted.

Mr. HOWE. I will not undertake to contradict the Senator from Pennsylvania on that point. My attention was called to it by a provost marshal in my State, and I gave him my own opinion of what the law ought to be, and what I supposed it was. It was that he should only be exempted from the particular draft made, but should be still liable to any subsequent draft.

Under the operation of the provision I have suggested, if a call is made for three hundred thousand men, and they are drawn from the box, and one hundred and fifty thousand choose to pay whatever is the sum fixed for commutation, say $300, they are exempt from that draft, and you only get half the number you want; but that fund is distributed among those who enter the service, and they get a bounty from the hands of those who are exempted from that burden, who owed it equally with them to the Government, taking it from them, and not a part of it from those parties who are drawn and go. They get $300 apiece. You pay a bounty to all these men of $300, and the men who serve, who go into the Army, pay a part of it. Let it come out of the pockets of those who are exempt from the service, and then they pay the whole of it.

I think such a provision would be satisfactory; and while I am speaking, as I do not propose to speak again on any of the points in this bill, I wish to say that it seems to me, whether a substitute is provided, or a sum of money is paid by way of commutation, it should exempt only from that particular draft. This bill, I notice, provides that the furnishing of a substitute exempts for the whole term of service specified in the call. The result of that is, that if your whole military force amounts to a million men absolutely liable to do military duty, and the President sees fit to call for five hundred thousand, and you make a draft of the five hundred thousand, and the five hundred thousand drawn, instead of going, hire the other five hundred thousand to go as substitutes for them, on a single draft of half a million men you have exhausted the whole military force, amounting to a million; and whatever may be the precise numbers, under this rule of action, every man who employs a substitute actually uses up two men belonging to the military force of the United States. It seems to me that that is prodigality, that it is improvident, and I hope that provision will be amended; and if the chairman of the Military Committee is at all disposed to adopt the provision which I have suggested here, then I should hope he would forego, at the present time, the adoption of this last clause to the first section.

Mr. WILSON. What is your proposition?

Mr. HOWE. This last proposition, at the close of the first section is, that after the 5th day of January there shall be no bounties paid by the United States Government to substitutes, and none to enlisted or drafted men, except the bounty of $100 provided by law. That would not be absolutely necessary anywhere, because if that be struck out there will be no law after the 5th of January authorizing the payment of any bounty to either of these classes of men. Being there it will be somewhat repugnant to the provision I propose to offer, which is not that there shall be no bounties paid, but no bounties paid by the Government, only a distribution of the commutation money paid by those who pay for exemption; that that shall be distributed among the men who go in. It does not come out of the Treasury, but comes out of the pockets of those who owed the same duty that these men paid, but who chose to pay money rather than to pay the duty.

Then, as I said, under the illustration that I gave of the operation of it, you do not get on the first draft the number of men you called for, but you have only reduced or weakened the military force by the exact number of men you get in the service, and all the rest still remain liable to duty, and if you want one hundred thousand more, you have only to turn the wheel again and they come up. In that way you certainly can fill up your Army to any number which the whole military force of the United States will warrant.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the question of repealing the $300 commutation clause is in another bill that I intend to call up after this.

Mr. HOWE. I know it.

Mr. WILSON. This is a simple bill making legal the bounties offered by the Government, making an appropriation for their payment, increasing the pay of the Army, and equalizing the pay of the colored troops. That is the substance of this bill, which we would like to get through at once. Out of this bill and the other has been framed a small bill in which is included an appropriation that I hope to welcome from the House of Representatives to-day or to-morrow morning, and that we shall be pretty sure to get through, I think, before the adjournment over the holidays.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to say that I was aware that that subject belonged to another bill, and I had prepared the proper amendments to move to it; but, indulging in the course of discussion indulged in by others, I made my remarks with a view of suggesting to the Senate the propriety of waiving this amendment for the present.

Mr. WILSON. In regard to this amendment, the committee, as I have before said, went upon the theory that the pledge of the Government should be redeemed; that we should stop there and leave matters as they now are, with the exception of substitutes; and it was thought best that persons drafted and employing substitutes should pay them in full, and that would relieve the Government.

I think, sir, from what has been said here to-day, that there is a great deal of misapprehension in regard to the history of recruiting the troops we have raised. As was said by the Senator from Maine, when the rebellion sprang upon the country, our people leaped to arms. We raised very readily a large number of men. At that time all kinds of employments were checked; the price of labor was very low. That fact undoubtedly had its effect, in addition to the spontaneous enthusiasm and patriotism of the people. But, sir, in the month of January, 1862, recruiting began to wane; and in January, February, and March, of 1862, we had very few men enlisted. At that time we had scattered through the country about one hundred and fifty unfilled regiments. Regiments had been started here and there all over the country; and we had several hundred recruiting officers out at enormous expense, and we were raising very few men. Those regiments could not be filled by the officers that had undertaken to raise them.

The Senator from Maine in March, 1862, called our attention to the reported number of men and the expenses of the recruiting system. He referred to the large number of men we were then supposed to have. We had not and could not obtain at the War Office evidence of the number we did have, but we were told that we had some seven to eight hundred thousand men. The Government stopped that mode of recruiting for about thirty days, and forced the consolidation of these fragments of regiments, scattered over the country, and ascertained what number of troops we actually had. Finding that we had fewer troops than had been represented, the Government immediately commenced an improved system of recruiting. I have no doubt, sir, that this action of the Government, instead of checking recruiting in the spring of 1862, really added to the military force of the country on the 1st of July of that year. I had no doubt of it then. I have none now.

In the middle of the summer of 1862 we began to feel, as the active campaigns progressed, that we required more men, and Congress passed an act providing for the calling out of the militia for nine months. I believe the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] was anxious to fix it at that time, as he thought nine months was long enough for militia to serve. We passed that act authorizing the Government to call upon the Governors of the States for militia for the term of nine months, and they were to be drafted under the militia laws of the States. While we were making that law, and just as we were about adjourning, there came to us from all parts of the country a call for an act of Congress providing for drafting men. The Albany Argus, the New York Express, and the World, the Illinois Register, and many of the leading journals of the Opposition, all maintained that drafting was the only equal way of getting troops. Then, sir, under the power to call out the militia, there was an enrollment begun in the various States, and by drafting and by volunteering under the bounties of the Government, and the bounties offered by the States and by towns and by individuals, we raised then something like four hundred thousand of the six hundred thousand men called for.

At the last session of Congress we began to feel what every nation feels that carries on a war any length of time: we began to realize that war is a great drain upon the labor of a country. The wages of labor everywhere rose, especially of skilled labor. Business revived, and has since been exceedingly active. Men who could earn, a few weeks after the rebellion broke out, but fifteen or twenty dollars a month, were able to earn forty or fifty dollars a month, and that fact has continued so to this time. This general prosperity is a check upon the filling up of the ranks of the Army. Besides that, many of our communities have already had immense drafts upon them. I live in a little town of five thousand three hundred inhabitants, and we have sent over five hundred men to the war for three years. It is so in many other places, and it is now very hard to get men to go at all unless they are drafted or paid enormous bounties.

Then, sir, we passed the enrollment act, and we desired to make that act just as humane as possible, and to correct the inequalities that existed in all the draft laws of the States. The burdens imposed by the State laws were upon the toiling poor, and those who were exempted were the more privileged portion of the community. In our enrollment law we exempted four or five classes of persons who were poor or had poor relatives dependent upon them. We inserted the commutation provision, of which so much has been said, which has been so much misrepresented and misunderstood. That provision was put into the act for no earthly reason but to make that law bear as lightly as possible upon the poor and the laboring portion of the people. We thought if that provision was not in the bill, it would be found when the draft was made that there would be an immense rise in the price of substitutes; that there would be great speculation, that the price of substitutes would go up to $1,200 or $1,500 or $2,000 in a few days; that the mechanics, the small farmers, the laboring men of the country, no matter what might be their condition, could not obtain substitutes; that thus the law would bear with great weight upon the poorer portion of the people. We thought $300 was a fair sum to fix; that the effect would be to keep down the price of substitutes, and that the Federal Government, having the whole country to recruit from, especially the rebel States, would relieve the loyal portion of the country to some extent, and put some of the burden upon the portion of the country in rebellion. We were right in our opinions.

This section of the act was misrepresented, I think very wickedly misrepresented. I think if that provision had not been in the law the same outcry would have been made against substitutes; that when we came to put the law into effect, and the price of substitutes had been very high, then the cry would have had great effect, from the fact that no man could get a substitute without paying away a small fortune. Nobody but rich men could obtain substitutes. Now it is proposed to strike out that clause. It is said by the Senator from Indiana, who made the proposition early in the session, and who has addressed us to-day against the provision, that it has not furnished the number of men needed. I believe the more we study it, we shall find that the enrollment act needs a few amendments of detail, but very few, and the main, leading features of it must be retained. I think all the trouble in the act was that it was not at once promptly and energetically put in force and kept in force until it brought into the field the required number of men or the money to recruit the required number of men. Now, sir, what is the fact? The Senator from Indiana has referred to the report up to the 1st day of November; but I have been told—in fact, it has been published—that we have obtained from fifty to sixty thousand men from the draft, and that we have now about twelve million dollars from the commutation. If it be $12,000,000, forty thousand men have paid the commutation. Now, it is said that we have not the men. Sir, with this money that was raised, the Secretary of War

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1863.

NEW SERIES.....No. 5.

early in the summer made a special and particular effort to enlist veterans; and veteran regiments were authorized to be raised in nearly all the States. They have three in my State, I think; they have one or two in Maine; I believe seven or eight or ten were authorized in Indiana; and so of other States. These veterans were promised the sum of $400; that is, the $300 coming from the commutation, and the $100 bounty provided by the existing law. We have raised some of those men with the money thus obtained from the commutation.

On the 17th day of October the President called for three hundred thousand volunteers, making this promise of $400 to veterans and $300 to other persons enlisting. It may be that the draft produced but fifty or sixty thousand men. I shall not dispute as to the number. The fact that the act existed on the statute-book fired the towns, the counties, and the States to renewed energy to fill up the ranks of the Army by volunteers, and we have got many thousand men because we had the law pressing upon the people. We obtained fifty or sixty thousand drafted men, or substitutes. About forty thousand men paid the commutation money, and the Government offered that money for veterans. Although the money is not all paid out, it is all promised, and more too; for instead of paying all the money to the recruit at once, the Government only pays him a certain portion of it, divides the sum into installments so as to cover the three years of his service, and in that way we have got more men absolutely enlisted by the use of this money than the number of men who paid the commutation.

I agreed, Mr. President, to report the amendatory bill with a provision striking out the commutation clause. The committee were against me on that question. It may be that I am mistaken, but I have looked upon that as a humane provision in regard to the poor and toiling men of the country, a provision in favor of the loyal sections of the Union, a provision that enables us to retain at home the skilled labor necessary to carry on the industrial pursuits of the country, and to furnish the money to carry on this war. I have regarded that provision as in favor of the people, in favor of the country, as furnishing the means that would enable us to raise troops in Tennessee, in Texas, in Arkansas, in Mississippi. Wherever our armies open the way, the poor, the utterly poor Union men who have lost their all, and who are willing to fight the battles of our country, may, by the use of this money, be induced to enlist, and it will also serve to put the black men of that section of the country into our service. We have raised in East Tennessee since Burnside entered it, I am told, thirty-five hundred men with this $300 bounty furnished by the mechanics, the laboring men, the business men scattered over the loyal States. We have raised some two or three thousand men in Arkansas, and report says that we have raised nearly two regiments in Texas now.

Sir, I say to you, if I had my way, instead of allowing substitutes to be received, I would do what the experience of the best military nations of the earth has shown to be proper—I would have every man drafted go himself or pay a reasonable commutation, and let the Government, with the money thus furnished, raise the men, and thus break up the demoralizing recruiting system that prevails. I believe, upon my conscience, that if the draft commences on the 5th day of January, and Congress repeals the $300 exemption clause, the price of substitutes before the 1st day of February will go up to $1,200 or $1,500. The poor laboring men, the small farmers, the mechanics, will have no mode on earth to relieve themselves. The men who enlist as substitutes will be able to obtain a large sum of money, and that is so much in favor of men who have little means. If I had the power to do it, if I had the entire arrangement of the law, I would amend the enrollment act so that if a man of means was drafted and he could render any military service to the country, if he could go into a fort and do duty on the sea-coast, or if he could be put into the fortifications to defend Washington, I would put him into that service or make him pay the commutation.

What we want to do, I take it, is, in the first place, to fill up the ranks of our armies, and keep them full; and in the next place we want to make the law bear as evenly as we can on the men upon whom it falls, for you cannot make perfect equality. You cannot, in this world of inequality, have any law that will operate equally upon all men. Make it as nearly equal as you can, let its burdens fall as lightly as possible upon the toiling and laboring poor men of the country, and at the same time let us look to it that we take care of the productive industry of the country, of our farms, our workshops, our manufactories, our ships, everything that is necessary to earn the means that shall keep up the credit of the Government and fill the Treasury, to put down this rebellion.

I would put another provision in this act, and I want to make the suggestion here now, and that is, that the States, or individuals of the States, or the officers of States, should be permitted, wherever our armies go or wherever they can go in the rebel States, to enlist black men or white men. In the department under General Grant there are some seventy regiments from the State of Illinois. We have the Mississippi river open. I would let the officers of the army from Illinois; I would let the authorities of Illinois, State, town, or county; I would let the people of Illinois or Indiana or any of the western States, or any other State, enlist white men in the disloyal States and put them into the ranks of their old regiments. We do not want to raise regiments of militia down there that would be good for nothing for a year. Put them into the old regiments, and let them count to the States enlisting them. I would raise black men there, and I would let those authorities or individuals go there if they choose and send fifty or sixty or one hundred miles into the country in the rebel States and bring in, and encourage to come in, the colored men, and put them into companies and regiments by themselves. We could thus pick up from the rebel States within the next two or three or four months tens of thousands of white men and black men, and relieve our own people from the great burdens that are pressing upon us; and for that purpose, if I had my way, I would let the commutation stand at some rate or in some form, and have this work go on.

The Senator from Indiana has spoken of the devotion of his own State, and of the manner in which her people have filled all the calls made upon them. Well, sir, we all acknowledge that the State of Indiana has been surpassed by no State, not only in filling the quotas called for, but in fighting the battles of the country in the field, and a great deal of this is due to the energy and organizing power of Governor Morton, the chief magistrate of that State, and a great deal of it is due to the patriotism and ability of that people. I would not say a word that should detract anything from the State of Indiana, or any other State, especially any western State; for if there be a sentiment that ought to be trampled down and stamped out, it is a sentiment that would foster hostility between the eastern and western States. The man who, in public or private life, fosters hatred between the East and the West, is not only a demagogue, but an enemy of his country and of the human race. I wish simply to say, sir, as far as concerns my own State, that in proportion to the men liable to do military duty, we have furnished for the Army and for the Navy our full share called for during the war. Senators from the West, when they speak, as they have a right to speak, not only of the patriotism of their people that crowd the ranks of our armies, but of their valor in the field, and, above all, the glorious opportunities that they have had over any other portion of the country in proving their valor in the field, should remember that in proportion to their population they have more men, and especially young men, than we have in our portion of the country. The State of Indiana has one hundred and eighteen thousand more people than the State of Massachusetts, and of these one hundred and eighteen thousand, one hundred and three thousand are males. Our young men emigrate, go to sea, go West; thousands of them are in the ranks of those very regiments of the West that have won so much honor. Many of our young men are officers, and many of them have been the leaders of those regiments and those brigades in the West.

I was in the State of Maine last autumn canvassing over five or six of her counties, and I was surprised to notice how few young men attended the meetings. The young men of that State are in other States, engaged in the active pursuits of life, or in the ranks of the Army. It is so all through our portion of the country. When you ask a State in New England in proportion to its population to furnish the same number of men that you ask of the States of the West, you are putting upon it a much greater burden than you put on the western States; because in the West you have more men according to population, and especially more young men fitted for military duty. Then there is another thing to be considered. We send an immense number of men into the Navy—a much larger number than any other section of the country. I have a letter from one town of my State saying we have furnished over six hundred men for the Navy of the United States, and we get no credit for that; and they called on us the other day to help make up a crew for one of our war vessels, and sixty-two men have been raised at an expense of $3,500, subscribed by the citizens, and we get no credit for that; and we are now called upon to fill our portion of the Army. That is our condition in New England; and I only state it that Senators, when they speak, as they have a right to speak, of the patriotism of their people, of their prompt response to the calls of the country, shall not here assail or misstate the patriotism or devotion of other sections of the country.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

MR. COLLAMER. I take it that if any one desires to amend this amendment before it is adopted, now is the time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Now is the time.

MR. COLLAMER. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out the words, "5th day of January, 1864," and inserting "commencement of the next draft," so that it will read: "and after the commencement of the next draft there shall be no bounties paid by the United States Government," &c.

MR. PRESIDENT, I frequently hear gentlemen here from different States say that their States will fill up the quota the President has called for, and are now doing it. I think that is probably true; but how are we doing it? We are filling up that quota by offering the men additional bounties by towns, by counties, by States, and by individuals, in addition to the bounties that the Government pays. That is the way we are doing it. I take it that whenever you repeal the $300 and $400 bounties we cannot do anything of that kind then, and we shall not fill up the quota at all under those circumstances. The bill proposes to strike off the Government bounties after the 5th of January. Now, I believe the Executive will receive such assurances and such evidences of the filling up of the Army under the present call as will induce him to give a little more time in which to do it; and the effect of this bill, if we pass it, when the people can be informed of it, will very much further that. The bill, if we pass it and publish it, will tell them this: "now you see if you will come in and volunteer and fill up the quota that is asked for, you may have these bounties; but you will understand that if you do not take these bounties and do not fill up the quota which has been called for, when the time comes for making another draft, you will not get any bounties at all unless it may be the $100 already provided for," and that, I believe, is not to be given to substitutes.

Now, I say that if the people are once informed of this bill, and especially of the other bill which the honorable chairman has reported in relation to the draft law, which tells those who have been out for nine months and less than two years that they too are to be enrolled, and that they now, being veterans, can come in and take the $400 bounty, and that unless they do it they may be subject hereafter to draft without any bounty, it will make a very great difference, and this call of the President may be filled up.

Then gentlemen say to me, "what if you put in these words and the authorities do not make any draft?" When will the Government cease to make a draft? Only when their calls upon the people fill up the Army, so that they do not need recruits. I am perfectly willing that they should fill up the Army under the system of bounties, notwithstanding what some gentlemen in other quarters may say.

Mr. President, it is not to be disguised that the burdens in this war upon the people of this country consist in two things: one is in rendering personal service, and the other is in paying money. Now it is attempted to separate these things altogether. The men who are of that age and ability to be subject to the performance of military duty and capable of it, owe their services to the Government, and as many of them as the Government needs should be called out, and they should render the service. All that is very well; I find no fault with it; but let us see how it works.

Here you repeal all essential bounties; you say to the men between twenty and forty-five years of age, "you owe duties to this Government by the way of service, and you shall render them; and another thing you see, too; you shall render them without the rest of us who should pay money paying much of anything to you." It will not do, say gentlemen, to go on giving bounties; it will be so expensive that we cannot do it. What is it, then? Essentially that we will put the whole duties upon the men between twenty and forty-five—the duties of rendering service without any compensation, without our contributing anything. I do not like that. I prefer to bear my part of what shall be an honorable and fair bounty to these men. Almost any of them can earn infinitely more at home than we pay them. Can you expect that people are so patriotic that they are more willing to be shot at for twenty dollars a month than to stay at home and receive fifty dollars for common labor? Is it a reasonable request? Not at all. Now, I say that in the form of bounties, or in the form of pay, (and it is not very material to me which, though I believe bounties will quickest fill the Army,) we should take measures to fill up the ranks. I am willing that the Government should fill the Army by offering these bounties. I do not like the idea of saying, in this bill, "you may continue the bounties to enable you to fill up your quota, but you shall not do it after the 5th of January." What if the Executive finds that the Army is being filled up rapidly, and will, under these laws, fill up rapidly, and he chooses to extend the time for the draft? Should he not have that privilege? Should not the influence of such a law be upon the people to enable them to fill up their quota? I think so.

Mr. President, I am unable, in the condition of my voice, as well as in other respects generally, to add anything to the advantage of what I have already said, but I still persist in having my amendment tried.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Congress, on full deliberation, fixed the bounty that they would give, in addition to the ordinary pay, &c., at $100. That is the way the law stood, and the way the law stands at this day. The Executive Government chose to offer of its own accord $400 to veterans, and $300 to other volunteers. Under that offer of the Government (made without law so far as it goes beyond the amount they received as commutation money) many men have enlisted. The object of the bill now before the Senate, as I understand it, is simply to declare that, as to all those who have enlisted under that offer of the Government, thus made without law, and as to all who may enlist under it previous to a given time, we will pay the bounties thus offered by the Government; we will make good their offer; but that after that time expires we will then revert to what Congress fixed upon as a proper bounty to be paid, to wit, $100. That is the amount of it. In that view of the law, the Senator from Vermont proposes to change the day fixed, and to say that these bounties may be paid until the beginning of the next draft. The effect is, substantially, to say to the Executive Government, "you may vary from what we have fixed upon at $100, and as long as you please, without our interference, go on and pay the $300 and the $400 which you fixed, and not we." That is the amount of it. It is not striking out any bounties which the Government has ever authorized—that is to say, the proper authority, Congress, has ever authorized—but it is simply making good what has been done. The honorable Senator from Vermont proposes to change entirely the system which Congress has adopted, and to put into the hands of the Executive the power to judge how long they shall continue to pay the bounties. They have already offered to men to enlist three or four times as much as Congress thought sufficient; and in addition the bill contains a clause for raising the pay of the soldiers to which I will not now advert.

Then it becomes a question of money. As I said before, it is very easy indeed for us to declare that we will pay this, or pay that, or pay the other. The sum may be limited, or may be almost unlimited. It is very easy to say that they ought to have it, or ought not to have it. But the question which I put before comes, how long can we continue to put into the hands of the Executive Government the power to offer just as much as they please in the shape of bounties, and have us indorse it, and let them have an unlimited time in which to act upon it? because it amounts to that. It is simply taking it out of our hands and saying that as to the law which we have passed providing for a draft, they may enforce it or not at their pleasure; if they choose to do it, do it; if they do not like it, they may offer just such sums as they please, within a certain limit, and keep it going. That is a state of the law I do not like. I want to have a day fixed one way or the other. If Congress is ready to offer a bounty of $400 to veterans and $300 to raw recruits, say so and disperse with your draft; but do not say to the War Department, "manage this thing to suit yourself, put off the draft or not, just as you think right, and pay bounties of three or four times the amount originally fixed by law; give as much as you please."

I think that is not a safe mode in which to leave it. I agree with the honorable Senator from Vermont, that under such circumstances the result would be precisely what he says: they could raise more men undoubtedly by these very large bounties than in any other way. Very likely they can for the present, and therefore if recruiting goes on at that large rate, they will defer the draft, and they will defer it indefinitely, so that the result of his motion is simply to change the law from what it now stands, $100 bounty, to $400 and $300, and the question is whether we are prepared to offer that as the law of the land, and offer it indefinitely, just as long as the Executive Government choose to authorize it.

I am opposed to that. Let us settle it one way or the other. I do not think it is just to the soldiers now in the field, the men who have not received these bounties or anything like them, but have gone there to fight. I do not think the system operates equally; to go on from day to day and month to month, increasing, as the war draws near its close, as I think it does, the bounties to be paid for services which at the most cannot begin to equal the services rendered for small bounties or for no bounties at all by the soldiers in the field. Besides, it has the other effect of which I spoke, to make men stop and consider and wait to see how much money they can get, instead of coming forward in defense of their country.

But it is stated here that the men can make more at home. That is true in some cases, but true in very few cases, so far as my observation goes. Throughout New England the counties and the towns pay very large bounties, and the States pay a bounty in addition; and I undertake to say, so far as my observation goes, that the great majority of men who go into the field, if they live and preserve their health, come out of it, if they are prudent, temperate, and careful, very much better off than they would be as a general rule if they had staid at home. There are exceptions, of course; but unless wages are very much higher and everything else much higher, as I dare say is the case, in Vermont than in Maine, the effect of which the Senator speaks in reference to that matter can hardly be considered as a just result, in my judgment.

Now, sir, I hope the bill will pass substantially as it is. I am not particular about the time; it may be enlarged if Senators think better; but a definite time should be fixed, and Congress should say when the payments of these large sums shall cease, and not the Executive Government.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose you put it the 1st day of February.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In order to make it just, it has been suggested to me that the draft must commence at the same time in all the States, or it would operate differently. I do not know—I am not familiar enough with military affairs; I defer to the judgment of my honorable friend who stands at the head of that committee—what time is the best, but I hold that this matter should be kept within the control of Congress. They should settle these questions, how much they are to pay and how long they are to pay it, and not be legislated out of their own legislation by the War Department. I will agree, as I stated before, to make good all the pledges they have given to men, or else I would have those men discharged and not deceived; but, for the future, let us proceed upon a system. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will modify my amendment to suit the views of other gentlemen rather than my own by saying "the commencement of the next draft, not later than the 1st of February, 1864." I believe other gentlemen are well enough satisfied with that, and therefore I put it in that shape. Now I wish merely to say a single word in reply to the honorable Senator from Maine. I am free to acknowledge that I would rather contribute my portion to pay the bounties which are now given, if they will fill the Army and produce the number of men wanted, than to resort to a draft. My judgment is that it would be best. It is said that it is unjust to those now in the service. They never make any complaint about it. All they ask is, "do send us help." But it is further to be remarked that according to this very bill we have before us, all the men in the Army now will soon have an opportunity to avail themselves of these bounties. Most of them have the opportunity to-day. Their three years are nearly out, and when the time is about out they will have an opportunity to reenlist and receive these bounties. I do not know, however, but that this limitation to the 1st of February will cut some of them off.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that the idea of the committee was that the soldiers in the field would be reenlisted as substitutes by bounties offered by persons who were drafted. If the Senator fixes it the 1st day of February, it will give us an opportunity, after the holidays, to make a few corrections in the enrollment law that we want to provide for, and make the draft commence on the 1st day of February.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am willing to let it stand in that way with that qualification for the present, though I must say again that I think a resort to a draft is not advisable if those who contribute to the taxes will pay their portion of the expenses of the war by paying the proper bounties.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On the latter clause of the amendment I have a word to say; that is that I object to that, being opposed to drafting, in fact being no particular friend to war anyhow; yet I wish as far as my State is concerned that the longest time possible shall be given to her, and that the citizens in my State shall not be forced to enter into this war on any particular day. I am perfectly willing to vote for any amount of bounty to volunteers, and I am not only willing to vote for any amount of money to volunteers, but I am willing, as far as I am individually concerned, to contribute out of my own private purse to recruit the armies of the United States. I am opposed to making it obligatory upon any citizen in my State, by force of a draft or otherwise, to enter into the armies of the United States; I wish to leave it to his own voluntary action. I therefore move, if it is in order, to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, by allowing these bounties to be paid till the 4th day of March instead of the 1st of February.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont being an amendment to an amendment, the Senator's motion is not now in order. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

MR. HICKS. If it be in order—I am not sure that it is—I would move now to strike out—

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that no amendments are in order while an amendment to an amendment, which is an amendment in the second degree, is pending.

MR. HICKS. The motion I desire to make is to strike out the latter part of the first section, commencing after the word "dollars" in the twentieth line.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not now in order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Maryland will now be in order.

MR. HICKS. I move to strike out all that part of the first section after the word "dollars" in the twentieth line. I do so because experience has satisfied me that volunteers in the Army are infinitely superior to forced men. I prefer to retain the $300 clause because it is a sum which many a man in moderate circumstances is able to raise, or, if he cannot raise it himself, his friends may contribute it for him. I think the money obtained in that way can be well spent as a bounty to induce men to enlist. We have among our people many soldiers who have left the field, having served out their terms and returned to their homes, single men, who would gladly take a bounty of $300 or $400 and go back, ready for service, drilled, disciplined, and in condition to enter immediately upon the service of the Government.

Besides, sir, I do not know how it is elsewhere, but these drafts, so far as the State of Maryland is concerned, have been very heavy. Many of our young men who have been drafted, before they could be forced to the rendezvous, have gone over to the confederates, and a great deal of confusion has been produced by it. I am induced to think that it is better to offer a bounty to those who will go and volunteer. Some honorable Senator has spoken of the amount of money that it will require. Why, sir, the money involved is but a small matter compared with the importance of putting down at the earliest day this unholy rebellion. The sooner we do it, the better; and we should so act as to raise the necessary forces as soon as possible. I feel exceedingly anxious that this bounty shall be continued. When this rebellion is put down and the machinery of this great Government is again put in motion, millions and millions of dollars will be raised without any inconvenience to the people at large. I move to strike out all after the word "dollars" in line twenty to the end of the section.

MR. GRIMES. We have not adopted the portion of the section which the Senator proposes to strike out.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the proposed amendment be reported, and the Chair will then pass upon the question.

THE SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee is to insert after line eighteen the words "except as provided in the fifth section of this act," and after the word "dollars," in line twenty, to insert, "and after the 5th day of January, 1864, there shall be no bounties paid by the United States Government to substitutes, and none to enlisted or drafted men except the bounty of $100 now provided by law."

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition of the Senator from Maryland is simply to strike out a clause which has not yet been inserted, and therefore it is not in order. The question is an affirmative one upon inserting the words which have been read as reported by the committee.

MR. HOWE. Do I understand the pending question to be on the adoption of both the clauses in italics?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on inserting all the words in italics in this section after the eighteenth line.

MR. HOWE. The proposition of the Senator from Maryland is to strike out the words in italics after the word "dollars" in the twentieth line.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands it; but the words, as printed, form an entire proposition to be inserted, and that amendment has not yet been adopted. The equivalent question and the direct question, in the affirmative form, is upon inserting these words.

MR. HOWE. The question in the affirmative is on inserting these and the preceding words in italics, as I understand it. That is what I am trying to understand. The words in italics embrace these words and a good deal more preceding.

MR. JOHNSON. May I ask how the bill will read if amended as proposed by my colleague?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that these separate words in italics are separate propositions; and the first question—and that will divest it of all complicity—is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to insert after the eighteenth line the words, "except as provided in the fifth section of this act." That is now the proposition directly before the Senate, not connected with the latter clause. The question is on this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the question is upon inserting the words printed in italics after the word "dollars" in the twentieth line to the close of the section. The proposition to strike out those words before they have been inserted is not in order. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposing to insert those words.

MR. JOHNSON. What are the words?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Let them be read again.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

And after the 5th day of January, 1864, there shall be no bounties paid by the United States Government to substitutes, and none to enlisted or drafted men except the bounty of $100 now provided by law.

MR. LANE, of Indiana. Is it now in order to move an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Maryland?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on inserting these words.

MR. LANE, of Indiana. What I want to get is to fix the 1st or 2d day of February, as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, instead of the 5th of January.

MR. HOWE. That has been negatived.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That question has been decided in the negative on a direct vote.

MR. LANE, of Indiana. I move the 2d of February, then.

MR. CLARK. You can move the same amendment in the Senate. It is now in committee.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the amendment reported by the committee by inserting "2d of February" instead of "5th day of January."

MR. SAULSBURY. I will ask my friend, the honorable Senator from Indiana, if he will not agree to substitute the 5th day of March?

MR. LANE, of Indiana. Probably the 2d of February will do. I do not think the Senate understood the question when the vote was taken on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

MR. JOHNSON. I would suggest to the friends of the bill as it is proposed to be amended by the committee, whether it is advisable to keep in the 5th day of January. It is a question whether the bill can be passed by that day.

MR. WILSON. I thought the suggestion was to fix the 2d of February.

MR. JOHNSON. I mention that as a reason why you should change the day.

MR. COLLAMER. My proposition was rejected without any vote that anybody could count.

MR. CLARK. We can have it tried again in the Senate.

MR. JOHNSON. Try it now.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment reported by the committee to insert "2d day of February" instead of "5th day of January."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 16.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question

now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was to strike out "twenty-five," in line three of section two, and to insert "fifteen;" and in like six of section two to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay a premium not exceeding fifteen dollars, under such regulations as he may deem expedient, for the enlistment of a veteran volunteer not now in the service, and a premium of not more than ten dollars for the enlistment of any other volunteer.

MR. HOWARD. I move to amend that amendment by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "twenty;" and in the second place, striking out "ten" and inserting "fifteen."

MR. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the committee what particular necessity there is for paying this premium at all to persons who are enlisted men? It must amount of course to a very large sum, and I should like to have an explanation as to whether it is absolutely necessary.

MR. WILSON. In answer to the inquiry I will say that the Government have authorized the payment of twenty-five dollars in the case of veterans, and fifteen dollars in other cases, as a premium for the purpose of encouraging enlistments. They provide, however, that no expenses are to attend it except this sum; that is, when a man obtains a recruit, if he be a veteran, he is paid twenty-five dollars. He may, in bringing the man to the point where he is to be recruited, have to pay several dollars; he has to pay that himself. The committee cut down the sum the Government is now paying from twenty-five to fifteen dollars in the case of veterans, and from fifteen to ten dollars in other cases. We had the impression that we ought to cut it down.

MR. COLLAMER. I wish to ask the chairman a practical question. Is not this necessarily so much additional to the bounty? If the man has made up his mind to enlist, will not the result be that he will get his neighbor to take him in to get the money? No man will be enlisted who has not somebody to carry him forward. This is just adding so much to the bounty money. Is not that all there is to it?

MR. HOWARD. Not all. If I understand it rightly, this is a premium which is given to the recruiting officer for the time, trouble, and care which he is compelled to bestow in the discharge of his duties.

MR. TRUMBULL. He gets his regular pay.

MR. HOWARD. He gets his regular pay besides this, to be sure, but there are a thousand incidental expenses which he is compelled to submit to, and which cannot be foreseen.

MR. TRUMBULL. The Government pays them.

MR. HOWARD. Oh, no. In many cases recruiting officers have been reduced almost to poverty in consequence of these incidental expenses which they are compelled to pay out of their own pockets if their friends in the neighborhood do not assist them. I know of one particular case of this kind, in my own State, where the burden has been absolutely insupportable; and it is not an isolated case by any means, as I have been informed. It strikes me that this is not, by any means, an unreasonable compensation by way of indemnifying the recruiting officer for these unforeseen expenditures which are required at his hands. The Government, it seems, have been allowing twenty-five dollars premium for each veteran recruit, and fifteen dollars for every recruit not a veteran. This committee have reduced the sum down to fifteen dollars in the one case, and ten dollars in the other. It strikes me that that is not sufficient, but it ought to be twenty dollars and fifteen dollars for these respective classes.

MR. GRIMES. I should like to be sure that I understand the Senator from Michigan. Do I understand him to say that the Government has been paying twenty-five dollars to each recruiting officer for every recruit that has been enlisted by him?

MR. HOWARD. I have been so informed. It has been done under the order of the Department; there is no law for it, I believe.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I should like to make another inquiry. Has anything been paid, under any regulation of the Department or otherwise, to any person presenting a recruit? The Senator is aware probably that even in time of peace any person might bring up a man to be enlisted, and the person who brought him up to the enlisting officer was paid a small compensation—a couple of dollars.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly it is the commonest thing. It is an indispensable portion of the expense.

Mr. GRIMES. What I want to know now is whether, in addition to the twenty-five dollars to the recruiting officer, there is any corresponding or other sum paid to a person who brings in a recruit?

Mr. HOWARD. Ordinarily, if you are a recruiting officer, and employ a man to bring recruits to you, you must pay him; and it is quite immaterial whether the payment comes from the special compensation of twenty-five dollars or fifteen dollars or your own pocket. The man whom you employ must be paid.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator does not understand me. I want to know whether, by authority of the Department, any money goes from the Treasury to pay the person who presents the recruit?

Mr. HOWARD. I fancy not. That would be an oddity.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the fact to be this: there was a bounty of two dollars that was paid to a man who brought in a recruit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was authorized by law.

Mr. WILSON. That was authorized by law; and when the Government called for these three hundred thousand men, they authorized the payment of sums not exceeding twenty-five dollars for a veteran, and fifteen dollars for any other person; and if a man brings in a dozen recruits whom he can pick up about the country, he gets this sum of money; and we have proposed to cut it down because we thought the price was too large.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether this compensation has been paid for recruiting colored troops?

Mr. WILSON. I understand they have been paying lately only ten dollars for colored troops.

Mr. GRIMES. How lately?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether it has been done in any other part of the country but General Butler's department. Some time in this month, I think, General Butler issued an order in his department for the raising of colored troops, and he agreed to pay a bounty of ten dollars, and I understand that that has been sanctioned by the War Department. In the section of this bill raising the pay of the colored troops to an equality with that of white troops, we do not give them any bounty. I was told by the Secretary of War that a bounty of ten dollars was thought to be ample to find and bring in those men.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask under what authority the Secretary of War authorizes a premium of ten dollars or twenty-five dollars? Is it under any existing law?

Mr. WILSON. I do not think there is any law for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The law limits it to two dollars.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think there is any law authorizing either the twenty-five dollars for veterans or the fifteen dollars for other recruits, or the ten dollars for colored troops; but they have a recruiting fund appropriated to them. I do not know how much they have got on hand of it. Out of that fund they thought it was necessary to pay these sums in order to hurry up the recruiting.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to suppose that there is any law which places that recruiting fund entirely in the discretion of the War Department, that the Secretary of War can do with it what he pleases?

Mr. WILSON. I do not mean to say that that is so. I think that in this matter of raising the three hundred thousand men under the last call, the Government have not stood strictly according to the letter of the law. That is my view of it, and I want to fix the thing if we can, and hold them to the law. I thought the sum ought to be reduced.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the effect of this section is precisely as suggested by the Senator from Vermont. This sum of twenty-five dollars is paid to any person who shall present a recruit. The result is that when a man makes up his mind to enlist, he makes an arrangement with some one to go with him and divide the money. It has worked so in our State, but my colleague knows more about it than I do. That has been the effect of it, I think. There was a premium of this kind paid by our State authorities, and the effect was, not to increase the enlistments, but to add a little to the bounty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest that, taking the average between twenty-five dollars and fifteen dollars, and calling the amount of the premium twenty dollars, supposing the recruits are one half veterans and one half other persons, the amount for three hundred thousand men would be $6,000,000—$6,000,000 paid in premiums for raising the three hundred thousand men! It is substantially, as the Senator from Vermont says, adding just so much to the bounties. There ought to be some consideration about it. I may state one fact that I am told is true in reference to Maine, for instance. They are raising there two veteran regiments, and the towns also are offering bounties for recruits, but no premium whatever is paid for bringing men to the veteran regiment, not a dollar; but the twenty-five dollars and the fifteen dollars have been offered generally for bringing men to go into the other regiments in the field; and yet the veteran regiments fill up very much faster than the others, with nobody to bring them forward at all.

Mr. HOWARD. Is it not quite clear, then, that as a veteran is a better soldier than a raw recruit, you should hold out an additional inducement for procuring him? That is the policy of the provision, if I understand it rightly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I understand the Senator exactly.

Mr. HOWARD. I say that a veteran soldier is better than a raw recruit, and it is therefore desirable to have a veteran, if you can procure him, and hence you must hold out some additional inducement to the recruiting officer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I do not dispute; but I am speaking of the policy of offering these large premiums at all. I believe the effect, in nine cases out of ten, is precisely what was stated by the Senator from Vermont; it is just adding so much to the bounty. A man knows that the premium is offered, and he takes care to secure the premium by going with some friend who brings him in as a recruit. In my judgment, that is the effect of it in many cases. I was stating that fact, that although they are raising two veteran regiments in Maine, they offer no premiums whatever to any individual to bring a man up. The veteran regiments are composed of one half veterans and one half new troops; but the premiums are confined to bringing men who enlist in the old regiments, and are sent to the regiments in the field; and notwithstanding the premium, I say those veteran regiments, where no premium is given for procuring enlistments, fill up very much faster than the others. They are now very nearly full, having something over eight hundred men in each of them.

Mr. HOWE. I have listened to the discussion so far with a single view of ascertaining who gets this premium that is offered. I understand the Senator from Michigan to say it is the recruiting officer; I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say it goes to the man who brings in the recruit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They pay it to anybody that brings in a recruit.

Mr. HOWE. There are very different parties in interest: the agent who looks up the soldier, the recruiting officer who enlists him and swears him into the service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the Senator will observe by the language of this section that it is to be paid to anybody, for the second section provides "that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay a premium not exceeding twenty-five dollars, under such regulations as he may deem expedient, for the enlistment of a veteran volunteer not now in the service, and a premium of not more than fifteen dollars for the enlistment of any other volunteer." A man comes with a recruit, either a veteran or otherwise, and offers him for enlistment, and claims his twenty-five dollars or fifteen dollars, as the case may be, and he gets it because he has obtained him for enlistment. In a majority of cases, I believe, there is an arrangement between the recruit and the person who brings him in.

Mr. HOWE. I was confused upon that point for two considerations. The first was that the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON] and the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], who is a member of the committee, I believe, differed as to who was the party to receive the money.

Mr. GRIMES. We know who the party is that pays.

Mr. HOWE. We know who the party is that pays. Then I was confused from another consideration: that, looking at the section as a lawyer, if I was a disbursing officer I could not, for my life, tell to whom to pay the money, whether to pay it to the soldier, to the recruiting officer, or to the agent who brought him in, the minister of the parish, or the poor-fund of the town.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a matter of regulation under this section.

Mr. HOWE. It does not regulate it.

Mr. HOWARD. The section reads, "under such regulations as he" (the Secretary of War) "may deem expedient."

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the chairman of the Military Committee does not expect to get through with this bill to-night. I think we had better adjourn, and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, December 21, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Mr. WINDOM as a member of the Committee of Claims, in place of Mr. ASHLEY, excused.

FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message of the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress a letter addressed to him by a committee representing the Freedmen's Aid Societies in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. The subject is regarded by the President as one of great magnitude and importance; but not having time to form a mature judgment of his own as to the plan they suggest, he submits the whole subject to Congress, attention to it being most imperatively demanded; which was referred to the select committee on emancipation, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, in compliance with the act of 1799, transmitting an abstract of returns of collections of customs, pursuant to the act of 1796, for the relief and protection of American seamen, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the number and names of the persons employed in the coast survey during the last fiscal year, their compensation, &c., and the expenditures under the direction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) of thanks to Major General Ulysses S. Grant, and the officers and soldiers who have fought under his command during this rebellion, and providing that the President of the United States shall cause a medal to be struck to be presented to Major General Grant in the name of the people of the United States of America.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for the first hour, to be committed without debate, and not to be again brought before the House by motions to reconsider.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES. Before the regular order is taken up, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed so much of the documentary and other evidence in the several cases of contested elections, already referred to the Committee of Elections as, in the judgment of said committee, will be necessary for a proper understanding of each case.

The resolution was agreed to.

VOTES RECORDED.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a privileged question. I had some business on Thursday last which called me from my seat at half past one o'clock. During my absence, my colleague, Mr. SMITH, introduced a series of resolutions, upon which the vote was taken in my absence. I have examined those resolutions, and I indorse them fully, and I ask the consent of the House to have my vote recorded in favor of each of those resolutions.

No objection being made, Mr. ANDERSON's votes were recorded as requested by him.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports, under the rule.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like the consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, and have put upon its passage, a joint resolution making two appropriations which it is necessary should be made before the holidays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this call will probably be completed in a few moments, and then unanimous consent can be asked. It has been the practice heretofore not to interrupt this call by requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The Judiciary Committee, to whom were referred joint resolutions touching the restoration of the civil authority in various States, have instructed me to report the same back to the House, and to ask that they be recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done under this call.

The call of committees was then continued and completed, no reports being made.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution to supply in part a deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing, and to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for bounties and premiums for volunteers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the joint resolution be read for information.

Mr. STEVENS. With the permission of the House I desire to make a brief statement. The first item of this joint resolution is necessary to pay the hands in the Public Printing Office. The money was due on Saturday, and they cannot very well get on without it.

The second item is for the pay of the bounties to volunteers; and the Secretary of War says the money will be required before the recess or holidays. If those two items are passed, the Committee of Ways and Means will not offer any further appropriation bills until after the recess. These two items are required now.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It appropriates $50,000 to supply deficiencies, in part, for public printing. It also appropriates $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be required, for the payment of bounties and advance pay and premiums for soldiers volunteering or enlisting in the service of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STROUSE. I desire to ask my colleague whether this appropriation is to be applied only to the payment of men volunteering from this time forward?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. I think, Mr. Speaker, that an important bill like this, appropriating over twenty million dollars, ought to receive the usual kind of reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It can be disposed of there without unnecessary delay. There are many questions to be asked on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to make it a special order for two o'clock to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. BLOW, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back a bill to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, and asked unanimous consent to have it considered in the House at this time, and to have the privilege of making a few remarks.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the bill read, first. I shall object to any such course unless there be something extraordinary about the matter.

The bill was read. It appropriates $700,612 13 to carry into effect the act approved March 25, 1862, to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pensions.

Mr. COX. I object. I think the bill ought to take the usual course.

Mr. BLOW. Will the gentleman from Ohio do me the favor to hear me for a few moments?

Mr. COX. I have no objection to hear the explanation.

Mr. BLOW. This bill appropriates over seven hundred thousand dollars for the payment of the home guards of the State of Missouri. The last Congress appointed a commission to examine and settle their claims; and that commission has made its report, finding that the sum appropriated in this bill is due to these men, the noblest body of men that have ever taken up arms in defense of their country. They are the men who responded to the call of General Nathaniel Lyon, in the darkest hour of our country's trial. Since that time the pay to which they are entitled has been withheld, and their families have been exposed to want. The action of the commission is final, and therefore there can be no doubt about the propriety of passing this bill. It has been duly considered in the Committee of Ways and Means, and has been found to be correct in all particulars.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BLOW. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDING. I have no objection to the consideration of this bill now, provided the gentleman from Missouri will consent to its being so amended as to extend its provisions to the State of Kentucky, where there are men situated similarly to those in Missouri, and who are entitled to the same measure of relief. If the gentlemen do not consent to that, I will move to refer the bill back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to inquire whether it should not be so amended as to include Kentucky as well as Missouri, so that equal justice may be done.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order at present.

Mr. BLOW. I would cheerfully consent, if a commission had been appointed in the case of Kentucky and made a report, as in the case of Missouri.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Missouri please have the law read, raising that commission?

The joint resolution to revive an act to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pensions, and for other purposes, was read. It revives the provisions of the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, and allows the commission therein provided for, six months after its passage within which to make its report.

Mr. BLOW. I repeat, sir, that the report was made in strict accordance with the joint resolution, and has undergone, as I have said, the investigation of the Committee of Ways and Means. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Missouri whether there has been any appropriation made to carry out the award of the commissioners?

Mr. BLOW. One hundred thousand dollars were appropriated. The allowed claims amounted to $800,612 15; that is, the claims allowed by the commission. The original claims were $1,500,000. If millions were paid by this Government, it would not remunerate those men for the service which they rendered.

Mr. COX. I do not seek any issue with the gentleman about the merits of the soldiers of Missouri. I know very well the service that they rendered. I do not think that we ought to set a precedent, at this early day of the session, of passing appropriation bills in the House without the usual consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the Committee of Ways and Means are to pass these bills at once, without proper investigation by the committee, and the House is simply to follow them as a flock of sheep follows their leader, we might dispense with the Committee of the Whole altogether.

I think that this matter will probably pass on a full consideration by the Committee of the Whole, and it had much better be referred to that committee. Nothing will be lost by the reference. I think that it can be done to-day, if the gentleman pleases; or to-morrow. The soldiers of Missouri can lose nothing by this postponement of a day or two, or, if gentlemen please, for a few hours, that this appropriation may be looked into in the light of the papers with which it is accompanied. Gentlemen are not making a factious opposition. It is not extraordinary to ask that an appropriation bill involving nearly a million dollars should be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLOW. I will make the motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but before doing so I desire to assure this House that this is a case of pressing necessity. I am astonished at the gentleman from Ohio, for he was a member of the last Congress, and is familiar with the whole course of legislation on this subject. These men, sir, have suffered for over two years from the want of this money, which is justly due to them. Their families, if God Almighty had not taken care of them last winter by the unusual mildness of the season, would have been subjected to untold suffering. I think that it is our imperative duty to take care of them at once. I now submit the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and also the motion that the bill be made the special order for one o'clock to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. Three o'clock.

Mr. BLOW. Very well, then; three o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is referred, under the rules, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to say a few words.

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I have not conferred with my colleague in reference to the proposition now before the House, but it is one of those cases with which I profess to be somewhat familiar. There is no class of soldiers in Missouri which has been so badly treated and so much neglected as the class now sought to be provided for by this bill. A number of the officers who commanded these men received their pay, but when the paymaster came to look at the pay rolls and the muster-in rolls, owing to the ignorance, or carelessness, or something else of those who had them in charge, they were so objectionable that he refused to pay on them. So, then, when the men gathered together for their pay, they were turned away because of this defect in the rolls. The men were discharged, and since that time they have remained without their pay. Last Congress passed a law for the creation of a board of commissioners, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, to which their claims should be submitted.

As my colleague has remarked, the claims presented before the commission were largely in excess of the amount allowed by them. The men who performed these services in Missouri, and for whom this appropriation is now asked, are really in need of the money. So far as I know, their necessities absolutely demand it, and it is as just an appropriation as has ever been brought before Congress.

I have no objection that the bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as I understand that is the regular course of legislation here, but I could not refrain from giving my indorsement to the remarks which have been made by my colleague in reference to the merits of these claims, and the propriety of their prompt payment by the passage of the appropriation now asked.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a suggestion in reference to this matter. There was a very long report made by the commissioners to whom these claims were referred under the act of Congress, showing the amount found due to the various classes of officers and soldiers. It seems to me that the gentleman from Missouri, unless he proposes to press this measure to a very early decision, ought to consent that the report of the commissioners should be printed for the consideration of the House.

Congress merely authorized the commissioners to ascertain the amount due the claimants. They have performed that duty, and it seems to me that their report ought to be published before any appropriation is made. I will not make any motion on the subject; I merely call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to it.

Mr. BLOW. I would remark that we made a strong effort to have the report of the commissioners printed and laid upon the desks of members this morning, but it could not be done. However, when we get into Committee of the Whole, it will take but fifteen minutes to read the report, and I trust the gentleman from Indiana and my friend from Ohio will give fifteen minutes to such an urgent claim upon this Congress.

Mr. COX. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that he move to make this bill the special order for to-morrow, and in the mean time have these papers printed.

At the last session of Congress we appropriated $100,000 to pay these Missouri soldiers, and if I remember rightly that was considered at the time rather a large sum for the purpose. I was therefore somewhat surprised to find the amount of this appropriation to be $700,000, making $800,000 in all.

The gentleman will understand that I make no captious objection to his bill; but I think the report had better be printed and examined, and then his bill will probably go through with more facility.

Mr. KASSON. There was a single fact that appeared to the committee, to which reference has not been made, and which may satisfy the gentleman from Ohio of the absence of the necessity for printing this report. In the joint resolution, which required the commissioners to report in three months, there was this clause: "whereupon" (that is, upon the report of the commissioners,) "the amount found due by them shall be paid;" in other words, the report of the commissioners was made final.

That being the fact, the Committee of Ways and Means found that there was nothing to do except to make an appropriation to satisfy the claims already established in accordance with the preëxisting law; and they therefore reported the bill unanimously as a legal necessity.

Mr. COX. I suppose the gentleman from Iowa knows that the $100,000 already appropriated has been paid?

Mr. KASSON. But the law itself required absolutely the payment by the Secretary of War upon the facts as found by the commission. There is no question before Congress except to find what the commission have reported to be due, and upon that an appropriation is to be made.

The question was then taken on Mr. Blow's motion, and it was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK asked unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill to repeal section three, and part of section ten, of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the bill. The bill was read. It repeals section three of the act recited, and so much of section ten as provides for the separate enrollment of each class; and it consolidates the two classes mentioned in the third section of the act.

Mr. STILES. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask leave to make a brief explanation on behalf of the committee.

Mr. STROUSE. I object.

WAR RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, presented a series of resolutions adopted at a war meeting held in the city of New York; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CALL FOR RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Kentucky, under which call bills on leave may be presented.

REBEL STATES.

Mr. YEAMAN offered the following resolutions, and moved the previous question on their adoption:

Resolved, That a conspiracy of persons, combined together, and assuming the name of a State, or a confederation of States, for levying war upon the United States, or for withdrawing such States from the Union; does not extinguish the political franchises of the loyal citizens of such States; and such loyal citizens have the right, at any time, to administer, amend, or establish a State government without other condition than that it shall be republican in form.

2. That a formal return or readmission of any State into the Union is not necessary. It is sufficient that the people, or those who are loyal in any State, and qualified by the election laws thereof in force before the rebellion, shall, at any time, resume the functions of a State government compatible with the Union, and with the Constitution and laws of the United States; and doing this is sufficient evidence of loyalty for the purpose of doing it.

3. That all questions touching property-rights and interests, arising out of confiscation and emancipation, and the effect and validity of any law, proclamation, military order, emergency of war, or act of rebellion, upon the title to any property, or upon the status of any persons heretofore held to service or labor in any State under the laws thereof, are left for the judicial determination of the courts of the United States.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope the previous question will not be seconded, and that the resolutions will be referred to the special committee.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I now move that the resolutions be referred to the select committee on the rebellious States; and on that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. YEAMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the previous question, to enable me to move an amendment to the motion of reference.

Mr. LOVEJOY declined to withdraw the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOVEJOY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. YEAMAN submitted, as a privileged question, the motion that the Committee of Elections be authorized to summon Colonel J. W. Foster, 65th Indiana mounted infantry, fourth cavalry brigade, army of the Ohio, to testify on behalf of himself in the matter of the contested election now pending before the House, wherein he [Mr. YEAMAN] was the returned member for the second congressional district of Kentucky, and J. H. McHenry was contestant.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that that matter should be referred to the Committee of Elections; and I move that it be so referred.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. SPALDING moved the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine be constituted to consider the subject of a national bankrupt act, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Gravens, Dawson, Dennison, Dumont, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Marey, McBride, McClung, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Swent, Tracy, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Wilson—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Bragg, Brooks, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grioulet, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Jencks, Julian, Knason, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Perry, Pike, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, Stevens, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—86.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. BEAMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. UPSON, was still detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. MALLORY was stated to have paired off with Mr. POMEROY.

The question recurred on the resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Mr. COX. I submit the following resolution, and demand the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of a total repeal of the act of March 3, 1863, for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes; and that, in lieu thereof, they report a bill calling forth the militia of the States to "execute the laws of the Union, and to suppress insurrection," in pursuance of the eighth section, article one, of the Constitution; and providing for the organization, arming, disciplining, and governing of the said militia, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. Or, if that be not expedient, that said committee inquire, further, into the expediency of repealing so much of said act as allows substitutes, or exemption for money; so that all citizens owing allegiance shall be liable to serve the Government, without regard to their pecuniary ability to obtain discharge therefrom by the procurement of substitutes or the payment of money; provided, however, that said substitution and exemption shall not be repealed so far as it relates to the present call for troops in States where the law, under that call, has not been executed.

The previous question was not seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 41, noes 65.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I propose to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then it goes over, under the rules.

PROVISIONAL MILITARY GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. ASHLEY introduced a bill to provide for the establishment of provisional military governments over the districts of country declared by the President's proclamation to be in rebellion against the Government of the United States, and to authorize the loyal citizens thereof to organize State governments, republican in form, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on rebellious States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected to a motion to print.

BUKEAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. SCHENCK introduced a bill to create a Bureau of Military Justice; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WESTERN NAVY-YARD.

Mr. HUTCHINS submitted the following resolution:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his recent message, recommends the establishment of a yard and depot for naval purposes upon one of our western rivers: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing such naval yard and depot, and locating the same at Portsmouth, or Ironton, or some other feasible point on the Ohio river within the Hanging Rock iron region of southern Ohio, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I think that that resolution ought to go to an investigating committee to ascertain where the place is that is referred to. [Laughter.]

The resolution was adopted.

FREEDMEN'S ASSOCIATION.

Mr. ASHLEY. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of this Hall be granted to the National Freedmen's Relief Association, for a public meeting, to be held on some evening early in January, to be designated by the officers of the association.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word. The Freedmen's Relief Association passed a resolution asking for the use of this Hall, and the Chaplain of the House, who is a member of it, requested that I should present this resolution for adoption.

Mr. PENDLETON. Debate arising, the resolution goes over. I propose also to debate it.

Mr. ASHLEY. Dr. King, of New York—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The resolution goes over if the resolution be debated.

Mr. COX. It will give rise to long debate.

Mr. ASHLEY. I withdraw the resolution.

CONSCRIPTION—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask leave to report, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill to repeal section three and part of section ten of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

Objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, then, that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

The motion was disagreed to, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency appropriation bill referred to it this morning.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask leave first to introduce a proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The House refused to go into committee; there being, on a division—ayes 61, noes 65.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the entire people of the States still adhering to the Federal Union are sorely exercised by reason of the reported suffering of their brethren now prisoners of war in the confederate States; and whereas the commonest promptings of humanity should induce the Executive representative of the nation to exhaust every proper effort to alleviate their distressed condition and restore them to their homes; and whereas we are well informed that the number of confederate prisoners in our hands is vastly in excess of the number of Federal prisoners in theirs, and that exchange could be made, excluding the question of color, that would restore our white brethren to liberty without prejudicing what may be supposed to be the rights of colored Federal soldiers now prisoners of war: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to promptly instruct those having in charge the matter of the exchange of prisoners between the United States and the so-called confederate States to propose an exchange of white men for white men, leaving other questions to be disposed of when the suffering white sons of the Republic shall have been restored to the service of the Government, their friends, and firesides.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the previous question be not seconded, will not amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The previous question was not seconded; there being, on a division—ayes 56, noes 75.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio, moved that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, William H. Rice, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—85.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MORRILL stated that his colleague, Mr. BAXTER, was confined to his room by indisposition.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following; and upon that motion I demand the previous question:

That this House approve of the measures taken by the Administration for the exchange of prisoners now held by the enemy in southern prisons, and that it is hereby recommended that the same be persisted in, to the end that a just and fair exchange may be had for all our prisoners now held by the rebels.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deading, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Coffroth, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—63.

So the substitute for the resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the preamble of the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I offer the following as an amendment to the preamble, upon which I demand the previous question:

Strike out all after the word "now," in the fourth line, and insert the following:

Held in rebel prisons, and that this House has witnessed with approbation the humane, patriotic, and statesmanlike efforts of the Government for a speedy exchange of all of said prisoners upon terms honorable, fair, and just: Therefore be it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask my colleague to withdraw his amendment, and allow me to move to lay the preamble on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will withdraw my amendment, to enable my colleague to make that motion.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move to lay the preamble on the table. It seems that gentlemen want to recognize the confederate States.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to inquire whether the effect of laying the preamble on the table will not be to carry the resolution with it.

The SPEAKER. It will not. The preamble is not covered by the previous question, which was ordered on the passage of the resolution, but it is subject to a separate demand for the previous question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—79.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, Coffroth, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—55.

So the preamble was laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. J. C. ALLEN stated that his colleague, Mr. W. J. ALLEN, was confined to his room by sickness.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to Congress, at his earliest convenience, if compatible, in his opinion, with the public interest, all the official information and correspondence which he may have received respecting the extension of the southwest branch of the Pacific railroad, as a war measure, as well as any order he may have made respecting the same, and the causes of revoking said order.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FENTON in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution to supply, in part, deficiencies for public printing, &c.

The joint resolution was read. It appropriates $50,000 to supply deficiencies, in part, in the appropriation for public printing, and $20,000,000 for the payment of bounties, advance pay, and premiums, for soldiers volunteering or enlisting in the service of the United States.

The joint resolution was read by clauses for amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania and this House will excuse me if, not having been in this House for some years past, and being somewhat startled by these appropriations of millions and millions, I inquire of him whether this $20,000,000 of bounties is in the estimates either of the Secretary of War or of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of War reports that there has been already deposited in the Treasury, or in the hands of provost marshals, subject to his order, $10,000,000, to which $2,000,000 has since been added, making in all $12,000,000. And here is an appropriation of $20,000,000 more. I doubt not that it is all correct, and I mean to throw no obstacle whatsoever in the way of the appropriations which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means reports from his committee. But, for my own instruction and the instruction of the House, guided, as I intend to be, by the estimates of the War Department and of the Treasury Department, I should like to know whether this $20,000,000 has been estimated for by either of those Departments. I should also like to know from the honorable gentleman, if it be within his power to give us the information, in what manner the $12,000,000 raised under the $300 commutation clause has been expended.

I hope the honorable gentleman will understand me, and therefore I repeat it, that I ask only information and light. The responsibility of all appropriations is on the other side of the House. I accept and comprehend my position and the position of those gentlemen with whom I am associated. But I beg also to be thoroughly informed. I want the House to be well informed, and the country to be well informed, of all disbursements that are made, and of the manner in which they are made.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, the information sought for is very proper. The section appropriating $20,000,000 is drawn up in the handwriting of the Secretary of War himself. It was handed by him to the chairman of the Military Committee, who handed it to me this morning, informing me that the Secretary would require nothing more before the holidays were ended, but that this was indispensable. I put the clause in this deficiency bill, as being the quickest way of getting it through both Houses. I suppose, although I have no definite information on the subject, that the ten or twelve millions paid for commutations has gone, as a matter of course, into the public Treasury. I should think so, although I have heard nothing from the Secretary of War on the subject. It is probable, however, that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is able to give the information that is sought.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania having given the House such information as he possessed, I feel it my duty, as a representative of a commercial city whose first interest it is to know what are to be the expenditures of the Government, to ask the honorable gentleman, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether, in our future appropriations, we are to be guided by the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, from which commercial men derive knowledge as to the public debt and the volume of currency afloat, or whether we are to be guided by occasional letters sent to the Committee of Ways and Means now and then, demanding, not thousands nor hundreds of thousands, which once would have startled the whole country, but millions and tens of millions. And I should like to know how often we are to have such applications.

If the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury have exhibited to the country their estimates, upon which they intend Congress should act, I claim, then, that it is those which should be our guide. If they are wrong, they should be revised. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will remember that when we served in this House some years ago, no man remonstrated more than he was in the habit of remonstrating—that was when we acted together in the old Whig party; no man, I say, remonstrated more than he did against the reports which happened to be made now and then by the Committee of Ways and Means on occasional letters received from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, the Secretary of War must have known ten or twenty days ago, as well as he does now, that $20,000,000 of appropriation was necessary for bounties. Why was it not inserted in the annual estimates? Why was not the country informed? Why were not the banks of the country given that information at an early period? If we go on to make appropriations in this way, by occasional calls from the Secretary of War, then estimates from the Secretary of the Treasury or from the Secretary of War will not be worth the paper upon which they are printed. Estimates hitherto made at the beginning of each session have been worth something. We have been guided by them during the session in the deliberations of Congress. We ought to be guided by them now. Is it not best for gentlemen on the other side, as well as for those on this side, that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury shall be held strictly to the estimates? I do not mean that they shall be rigidly held to hundreds, but to hundreds of thousands and millions at least. I speak this in no partisan feeling, but I believe that it is indispensably necessary for the interests of the great city which I in part represent, for its manufacturing and for its commercial interests to know in some degree what are to be the annual expenditures of the Government. It is necessary in order that those great interests of the country should act accordingly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has stated correctly what has taken place between him and myself in reference to the subject now under consideration. I called last evening on the Secretary of War and had a conversation with him in reference to the legislation it may be expedient to pass before the adjournment for the holidays. I explained to him I thought that, with the present disposition of the House, it would be impossible for the Committee on Military Affairs to get through any general legislation which should embrace an entire revision of the enrollment act, or any considerable number of amendments, or any legislation looking generally to appropriations for military purposes. He told me that if he could get, so far as appropriations were concerned, a single section appropriating what was necessary, or what might become necessary to meet the bounties, premiums, and advances to be given to volunteers and enlisted men, it would be all that is now essentially required, and that then everything would go on until after the holidays with that help. He sat at his table and drew the section which is now part of the deficiency bill. It was incorporated in that bill by the Committee of Ways and Means on my suggestion. My question to the Secretary of War was this: was that amount contained in the estimates submitted by him? He said that it was. I learned afterwards from the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate that they had a bill pending, embracing, among other things, this same appropriation of $20,000,000, and he told me that it was in accordance with the estimates for the necessities of the Government in reference to that expenditure. I objected that it was not proper that an appropriation of that kind should come in a bill from the Senate, but that it should originate in this House. It was on information derived from these quarters that the Committee on Military Affairs examined the subject and submitted the section to the Committee of Ways and Means to be added to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. STEVENS. In the estimates the Secretary speaks of having $10,000,000 already in his hands, which we think ought to be properly appropriated by Congress, and then he asks for $10,000,000 more, on page 156 of the estimates, for advanced bounties, premiums, and so on.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether the $10,000,000 in the Treasury arising from the exemption money is included in this proposed appropriation, or whether that sum requires re-appropriation?

Mr. STEVENS. My understanding is that it does. There is no law appropriating the amount. It has been paid into the Treasury, but has never been appropriated by Congress.

Mr. BROOKS. I think the bill ought to be so amended as to state that fact. I ask the Clerk to read the second clause.

The Clerk again read the second clause.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means understand that the ten or twelve millions commutation money are included in this appropriation?

Mr. STEVENS. That is my understanding. I have had no communication with the Secretary of War, but I suppose this sum includes the ten or twelve millions.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend the appropriation by adding to the clause the following words:

Which shall include all the sums hitherto paid into the Treasury, or to be hereafter paid into the Treasury, for commutation money under the enrollment act.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that I have any objection to that amendment, though I do not precisely see the necessity for it. If this money is in the Treasury, of course we have to make the appropriation to take it out.

Mr. COX. I think there is some confusion springing out of this matter. The Secretary of War, I remember, states in his report that he has raised fifty thousand men under the enrollment act. Now, as I understand it, only about five thousand men have been raised by this extorted service. Forty-five thousand, I suppose, were raised by the money paid in as exemption money; and the Secretary says in his report that the fund of $10,000,000 raised under the enrollment act as commutation money is deposited with the United States Assistant Treasurers, and is being applied to procuring substitutes by the payment of bounty and premium. I suppose he is now paying out that very $10,000,000, and therefore no appropriation is required, so far as his action is concerned. He is using the money now. I do not, therefore, see the use of this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman considers that that use of the money by the Secretary is strictly legal without any act of Congress appropriating it, I have no objection to reducing this appropriation to $10,000,000, and letting it stand as it is.

Mr. COX. I think it had better be done in that way.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If I understand the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] he supposes that the $10,000,000 is already being paid out. I understand the Secretary of War to ask for $20,000,000 now, whether that sum has been paid out or not. I do not know how that is; but, if that money has been paid out, I do not think $10,000,000 will meet the demands of the present hour; and I think that consequently the bill should remain as it is.

Mr. STEVENS. My idea is that the ten millions commutation money having been paid into the Treasury, it ought to be appropriated by Congress, and if it has been paid out, we should appropriate it as a deficiency. There is some doubt in my mind about the right to pay it out without such an appropriation. I know it has been done, but I suppose it is included in this deficiency.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, from what I know of this matter, I am inclined to agree with my colleague that the money already received for commutation has been paid out for the volunteering service. I am not sure that it is so. I have not looked into the matter definitely so as to know certainly, but my impression is that that money has been already paid out, and that the Secretary now asks $20,000,000 in addition. Whether the money has been properly or legally paid I do not presume to decide, but it seems to me that the peculiar pressure of our volunteering interests at this moment makes it unwise to reduce this amount from $20,000,000 to $10,000,000.

It is very true, as my colleague also said, that we are to rely chiefly on the volunteer system for recruiting our Army, rather than on conscription. There is a very great activity in volunteering at this time; but that cannot continue unless we can have a supply of money on hand to pay bounties and advance pay as inducements to volunteer. It seems to me that we ought not to block the operations of the Government by skimping it in the matter of money. It is my opinion, from all that I know, that we should not allow the volunteering system to be checked at this time for want of money. I am therefore opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York; and I trust the Government will be given the $20,000,000 it asks.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have not made any opposition to the appropriation of this $20,000,000. I believe that the only way to raise the proper force to carry on this war is by the volunteer system. The conscription law passed at the last session, lashed through this House, has proved an utter failure. The Secretary of War himself confesses it. What, then, have we to do? I believe it to be the policy of the Government to offer the largest pecuniary inducements for the purpose of getting volunteers, and not, by any unreplicable system, extort military service. I shall therefore vote for the appropriation of $20,000,000. But in doing so, I do not wish to be understood as expressing my approbation of the conduct of the Secretary of War in paying out the money received for commutations without the authority of Congress. He has been paying it out, as he says in his report, not alone for white soldiers, but for black soldiers, for slaves in Maryland and elsewhere.

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. That is all right.

Mr. COX. Gentlemen say that that is all right. Well, we differ about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. The law provides that the person drawn may furnish an acceptable substitute to take his place in the draft, or may pay, to such person as the Secretary of War may authorize to receive it, such sum, not exceeding $300, as the Secretary may determine, for the procurement of such substitute. It then provides that the Secretary of War shall fix the sum at the time he orders the draft. The law expressly provides that the payments are not to be made into the Treasury, but are to be under the control of the War Department.

Mr. COX. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa as to the effect of the law. These moneys came properly into the Treasury, and could not be drawn from thence without specific appropriation. They ought at least to be within the control of the national Legislature.

I repeat, I would not throw any impediment in the way of the Secretary in regard to this $20,000,000. Let him have it, and let the country escape, if possible, the disgrace and degradation of this drafting business on the 5th of January.

As to the $12,000,000 raised by commutation, let the Military Committee mature some measure by which to reach it. I do not think that my criticism on the conduct of the Administration or any of its members is worth much just now, especially after the repeated violations of law and Constitution which have characterized the Administration. It has become almost a habit to disregard laws. Perhaps that is incident to war times. Power tends to aggrandize itself in times like these. But we, at least, as the people's representatives, ought to keep a proper clench upon them at the proper times—and this is one of them.

Let the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Military Affairs examine whether or not this $12,000,000 in the Treasury shall be reappropriated, or shall be directed in a proper course hereafter. I would not place any obstacle in the way of this $20,000,000 bill. Let it pass. The people of all parties in the country will welcome such an act.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not prevail. I fail to see any necessity for it. I hope the bill will be passed as it is, especially if we are determined to adjourn for the holidays, as this money will be needed between now and the 5th of January.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose that this matter need not be very much discussed now; but I want to express my dissent from some statements and theories advanced here. In the first place, I think that, as a nation, we ought to be educated up to the point of holding ourselves in readiness for a draft, or for any other purpose necessary to save the life of the nation. But as we have succeeded so admirably, in spite of the strenuous efforts of the party to which gentlemen on the other side belong, in securing volunteers, I am desirous of carrying out that plan. I therefore hope that all possible inducements will be held out to volunteers, and, consequently, that the Secretary of War will be clothed with power, by this appropriation, to offer them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must enter my protest against this constant and persistent slandering of the Administration. I will not allow any such declarations to pass without a decided denial that this Administration ever was in the habit of violating the Constitution or laws, and that they are hardly conscious of doing it. Now, sir, if anybody knows anything about it, he knows that such statements are utterly untrue. There never was an Administration since the organization of the Government so cautious and sensitive in regard to the obligations of the Constitution and laws of the United States. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] No, sir, never. Those gentlemen would have laughed in a different style if the law and Constitution had been enforced against them as they ought to have been. [Applause in the galleries.] And it comes with an ill grace for gentlemen to come here now, after an appeal has been made to the people, who are the ultimate arbitrators, and to put questions whether the Administration has been obedient to the law and the Constitution. Those gentlemen come here after having made an appeal to the people against the Administration as not obeying the law and the Constitution; they come here without a constituency—with the decision of the people in favor of the Administration. With an unprecedented and unblushing effrontery they come here and make this allegation, as if anybody would believe them. Sir, I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I shall hold myself ready to vote for every dollar of money needed by the Administration to carry on the war for the suppression of this rebellion. No man shall go before me in that matter. But, sir, when I am voting money to the Government I would like to know—my constituents would like to know, and have the right to know—what that money is for. It does seem to me perfectly reasonable that we should require from the chairman of one or other of the committees some explanation. Does this $20,000,000 include the $10,000,000 of commutation money, or does it not? If the $20,000,000 be necessary, in addition, I will vote for it; but let us vote understandingly. All I ask is information on the subject, and to that I am entitled. Now, sir, as I am impressed at this moment, I shall sustain the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] because I think it reasonable and proper in itself.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to read, for the information of the House, a paragraph of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which settles, I think, this whole matter. It is as follows:

"The important and responsible duty of securing and keeping, under the direction of the President and War Department, commutation money from drafted citizens, has been assumed by the collectors of internal revenue, at the instance of the Secretary of War. In the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury this money should be paid directly into the Treasury and drawn out upon requisitions for the purposes to which it is appropriated by Congress. The Secretary of War thought, however, that the other mode of collection and disbursements would be less burdensome to drafted men and more convenient for the payment of substitutes. His wishes were promptly complied with, and the whole matter is now submitted to Congress."

Mr. SCHENCK. The commutation money that has been paid has nothing to do with the matter before the House. As I said before, the Secretary of War informed me that $20,000,000 would be needed to cover the requirements for bounties and premiums advanced. I inquired whether that was his estimate, and he replied that it was. I find an estimate for pay of advanced bounty to volunteers and drafted men under the acts of July 5, 1862, and March 3, 1863, $5,000,000, and for a deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1864, another $5,000,000. That does not include anything except bounty. The premiums are included in a subsequent item upon the same page, making an aggregate for deficiencies for the year expiring June 30, 1864, of $10,000,000, and the estimate for the year ending June 30, 1865, is $15,700,000, or an aggregate of $25,700,000. What the Secretary asks now is that we make an appropriation of $20,000,000, leaving $5,700,000 to cover a number of other items that may be required. The advanced pay not included in the bounties and premiums here estimated for is included in the $177,000,000 for the payment of the Army. If that be the case, this is only anticipating out of that $177,000,000 so much as may be necessary to be expended at once for advanced pay, and therefore will be so much, when we come to appropriate for the payment of the Army, to be deducted from the $177,000,000.

With this explanation, this bill, it will be found, does not call for as much as the Secretary has estimated for under these different heads, but leaves a margin of $5,700,000 to cover items not included in the present section.

I think, therefore, with this explanation made to the Military Committee, and through that committee communicated to the Committee of Ways and Means, leaving the responsibility for the application of the money to the Administration, the House ought to pass upon this particular section, and allow the $20,000,000.

I believe, in reference to some little that has been said by a colleague of mine upon this floor, [Mr. Cox,] that the people of this country may be classified into three great divisions: those who are for carrying on this war to crush out this rebellion and of affording all the means necessary to accomplish that end; those who are not for putting down the rebellion at all; and a third class who are for putting down the rebellion, but are opposed to all the means for accomplishing that object. Now, belonging as I do exclusively to the first class upon this side of the House, I think we should do well to give what is now asked, and gentlemen upon the opposite side will see the propriety of it, if they do not approve of either of the other classifications.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not, if it is possible to avoid it, intend to enter into any party debate on this appropriation. I mean, if it be within my power, to avoid it. But I hold it to be the first duty—and therefore I listened with the greatest pleasure to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING]—I hold it to be the first duty of the representatives of the people to know where every dollar of the public money goes. If I wanted to oppose the honorable gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and to break down their party, I would give them full length in all their appropriations; I would pour forth upon them millions upon millions, until the currency was so expanded that their Treasury notes would not be worth as much as the assignats of France, or the continental notes of the old Revolution. It is because I am their friend, or the friend of principle, that I desire to know how the money goes, and in what manner every dollar of the public money is to be appropriated. If this be opposition to the Administration, then I am in opposition; but I hold it to be the best friendship that a public man can exhibit to an Administration to look to its disbursements, to look to its economy.

Here are $10,000,000 afloat, pronounced so to be by the Secretary of War; the amount received as commutation money is known to be $12,000,000, and, perhaps, going on to fifteen or twenty million dollars. Where is it? Who knows? Who can tell? In whose pockets is it? Who has appropriated it? What Representative of the people has voted to appropriate it? Where are those twelve or fifteen million dollars? I have not only a right to know, but every honorable gentleman upon the other side of the House has a right to know where this money is. If the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] wants to appropriate thirty or thirty-five million dollars, why does not he say so? If, in addition to these $20,000,000 for bounties, he wants the commutation money besides, let him report an appropriation bill for that purpose, and I will throw no obstruction whatsoever in his way.

The object of my amendment, and the sole object, is to sanction legally the disbursement by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury of what seems to me at present an illegal appropriation for bounties. I have no other object in view, no other desire. I desire so to comport myself in this House as to support the Administration in all honest measures for carrying on the Government; but I desire also to know, and I mean to know, if the rules and orders of this House will permit it, where every dollar of the public money is going.

The gentleman from Ohio has the advantage over me in having a book of estimates before him, which have not been laid before members on this side of the House. We have not had an opportunity to look into these documents from which he has read, and therefore we are not so well informed as he is. But, if I understand the reading of the honorable gentleman, there are $10,000,000 wanted for past appropriations of bounties, and $15,000,000 additional for the fiscal year 1864-5. The fiscal year does not commence till June 30; and the usual, ordinary, and proper way is, when the annual appropriation bill is reported to insert this $15,000,000 there. That is the way in which we were accustomed to do business in this House when one dollar was a dollar, and proper consideration was given to a dollar, not only in time of peace, but in time of war. In our war with Mexico, and in our Indian difficulties, it has been to the honor of both sides of this House that it has demanded from the then Administration, of whatsoever party it might be, a proper understanding of all the appropriations on estimates reported in a proper way and at the proper time. I do not feel that this application for $20,000,000 has come to us in a proper way; but if the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] or the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] wants $30,000,000, $40,000,000, or $50,000,000 for these bounties, he has but to say so, and I will throw no obstacle in the way. All they ask for at present is a little appropriation of $20,000,000, of which no report has been made, and of which there is no record now before the country.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, the responsibilities of our action on this and all other bills rest with this side of the House; and I think—judging by the results of the recent elections—that it is to the actions and opinions of this side of the House that the people of the country, merchants, bankers, and people of all classes, look, and look with confidence. I remember to have once seen a beggar craving a sixpence. The good lady from whom he asked the boon declined making the gift, but proposed to give him, instead thereof, some advice: "Thank you, madam," said he, "I am full of it." I feel, I must confess, a little that way now—I have had quite enough of such advice as we have been getting to-day.

What is asked of us, and how is it asked? The proper committee of the House, that of Ways and Means, moved thereto by the proper committee for the purpose, that on Military Affairs, reports a bill to appropriate a certain sum of money—a sum within the estimates submitted by the Secretary of War, the proper officer. And on the proposition to appropriate money thus called for, the House is to receive a lecture on the danger of expanding the currency to the proportion of the French assignats, and other matters equally foreign to the subject. There is no proposition to expand the currency of the country before the House; nor is there any disposition on the part of the majority to make an appropriation which shall not be legitimate, well advised, and in support of the great ends of the Government. The recent elections have told the men who hold the interests of the country in their hands that the first great object, that nearest to the heart of the people, is the immediate suppression of the rebellion. This bill, so well timed, is important for the promotion of that desirable end. We are on the eve of an adjournment which may last for a fortnight. The Secretary of War tells us he wants money on the eve of the draft now seeming to be imminent, while volunteering is yet active, for bounties, advance pay, and premiums, wherewith to promote voluntary enlistments. How shall we say to the people that we are supporting the war and crushing the rebellion if, instead of passing the bill, we call upon the Secretary of War to come up and tell us how he is expending the $12,000,000 placed in his hands, by the express language of the act under which that sum accrued, for the purpose of procuring substitutes?

I shall not vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York; and I hope that, before we adjourn, we will so vote on this question that every loyal man in the country will feel that he did right in voting for the men who are here, because of their manifest disposition to vote all the men and money that the war requires without equivocation or dodging, or holding to accountability, on suggested suspicion, the heads of Departments.

A word, now, as to the anti-republican means of replenishing our Army, denounced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] I voted for the conscription bill, and am in favor of a draft, if necessary to make our Army adequate to its great work. I have not yet seen the man in the country who is too good to owe it the utmost allegiance, even to the laying down of his life for it. And I have yet seen no fairer way of getting an army than by putting all the names of the able-bodied men of the country in the wheel and drawing therefrom those whom Providence shall designate as its soldiers. I take the responsibility of standing by the draft. True, I would rather see the youth of the country doing as the regiments from my own district, veterans who have borne the brunt and shocks of war for well-nigh three years, are doing, cheerfully and enthusiastically volunteering again, determined to fill up the ranks and move on to perfect conquest. But when there comes a pause in volunteering, during which the country needs soldiers, enforce the draft. Let the richest and the poorest, the humblest and the proudest, march together in obedience to the laws of our country to the support of its institutions. I have failed to discover wherein it is anti-republican to make all stand equal before the law in their liability to perform, even to the utmost, their duty to the country.

Mr. COX. I can tell the gentleman where he can find it laid down. If he will look in the work of Dr. Lieber, called Civil Liberty, he will find it laid down as against the genius of republican institutions, as against our traditional policy as inherited from Great Britain, against our history as Anglo-Saxons, against the English and American Constitutions. And that authority of Dr. Lieber is now being used by the Secretary of War in codifying the laws of war for this Government. I refer the gentleman, very respectfully, to that authority.

Mr. KELLEY. I have never seen the man who was so wise that he was not liable to be mistaken on some point. And from the gentleman's high authority I appeal to my own instincts, and to the genuine republicanism of my countrymen. [Applause in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the galleries that if these demonstrations are repeated, he will be compelled to ask the Doorkeeper to clear the galleries.

Mr. STEVENS. I trust the committee is now ready to come to a vote upon this joint resolution without further discussion. I confess, that as this matter did not come originally from the Committee of Ways and Means, they had not had an opportunity to examine the estimates before reporting it, and that I was therefore led into an error in the reply I made to the inquiry very properly made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] Upon the examination I have since made, I do not find this $20,000,000 in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury as a deficiency. I do not find that amount carried into the present year by any of the officers of the Government. The estimate, however, was yesterday or the day before sent to the Committee on Military Affairs, stating that he wanted these $20,000,000 immediately for bounties.

I was therefore mistaken in supposing that the commutation money was included in this appropriation, because that commutation money, as we are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, has never gone into the Treasury at all, but has been used, as it very properly could be used under the law, by the Government to procure substitutes for those who took this method to avoid procuring substitutes for themselves. That money has therefore already been paid out to procure substitutes for drafted men to go into the Army.

That fund is then out of the question, and the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is not, as I supposed, an amendment proper to be adopted.

Again, I do not find the $10,000,000 I referred to before, in the estimates, properly applicable to this appropriation. That applies to the year ending 30th of June, 1865, and therefore cannot properly be taken into account in any appropriation for this year.

There is the sum of $177,000,000 required for the whole pay of volunteers. Now, it will be recollected that under the present law we are to pay $100 bounty to each man who volunteers, and the sum of $30,000,000 is therefore required to pay the bounties of the three hundred thousand men now ordered out, to save the draft. It is necessary that this amount should be paid before the 5th of the next month if the whole number is raised, and it is to provide for the voluntary enlistments between this time and the time the draft is ordered that this $20,000,000 is wanted. Only $20,000,000 is called for instead of $30,000,000, because it is not estimated that the whole number will be obtained, and it will be observed that only so much of that sum is appropriated as shall be found necessary.

I now, therefore, understand fully the estimates sent to the Committee on Military Affairs; and hoping that the entire $20,000,000 will be required before the 5th of January to pay the bounties of the men who shall enlist, I trust the bill will pass without opposition, and that the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted, because, as I have stated, the commutation money has not gone into the Treasury at all, as I inadvertently supposed it had, and does not require appropriation by us to enable the Government to avail itself of it.

I have no time and no taste, upon a mere question of appropriation, to enter into a political discussion. We shall have ample time hereafter to discuss every matter, Buncombe included, and I hope that upon a mere question of appropriation, like this, the discussion will be confined to the simple question very properly put by the gentleman from New York, and to the appropriation of $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for this purpose.

Mr. KERNAN. I entirely concur with the gentleman who has just taken his seat in his desire that we should waive, on this question, all party and political discussion. And I want to say further, that although I am not able, from the explanation of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to understand in precisely what condition the fund which has been raised by commutation money now remains, yet it seems to me that we need not at all, in deciding upon the proposed appropriation, hesitate to vote for it because we do not know in what way precisely or how that money is situated, or what portion, if any, of it has been used.

I feel a great desire that we should vote with unanimity, and entire unanimity, for appropriating the necessary money asked for by the Secretary of War to aid in filling up our armies with volunteers. I will not now be tempted to say one word in reference to the other mode that has been alluded to for raising troops. We all know that throughout the country, in every gentleman's district, I doubt not—I know it is so in my own—the people of all parties are united in an effort to bring forth the necessary men as we would desire to have them come, voluntarily, to uphold our flag, maintain the authority of the Constitution, and suppress those who have risen in arms to overthrow the Constitution and Government under which we have all so long and so happily lived.

It seems to me, therefore, that while, in accordance with the suggestions which have been made, we will all do our duty to our constituents in looking carefully after the expenditures of money, yet, on the present occasion, when we all know large sums of money are needed and will be properly applied, when all parties agree in the propriety of applying them to the raising of volunteers, we should with entire unanimity appropriate this sum now called for, or so much of it as may be necessary to pay this bounty to volunteers. I hope it will all be required by the volunteers who will come forward, and that we shall thus have our armies filled up to an extent that will result in bringing to a speedy close this rebellion against our Government.

Mr. STROUSE. I am in favor of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] We know that upwards of $10,000,000 have been raised by what is called commutation money under the conscription bill. There is nothing improper or wrong in appropriating this money to aid in raising volunteers, because it was raised for that purpose. And I will say here, that whatever our individual opinions may be in regard to the conduct of the war or the acts of the Administration, I solemnly protest, upon the part of this side of the House, against the aspersions made by certain gentlemen upon the other side as regards a factious spirit, throwing impediments in the way of the Administration, and to prevent the wheels of the Government from rolling smoothly. Something has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lovejoy] about the recent elections, charging us on this side of the House with having no constituencies. I desire to say that I represent here one of the largest districts in the United States, and that I am not opposed to favoring the Administration in all just, legal, and constitutional demands. I have the honor to represent a district which sent the first company of volunteers to this capital for its defense in the dark days of April, 1861. And we have sent from that district since the commencement of the war seven thousand able-bodied men for the support of the Government, the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws.

I am in favor of appropriating as large a sum of money as may be necessary for the purpose of paying liberal bounties to the men who volunteer, and thus avoid all drafting or conscripting of our citizens. I am opposed to the principle of conscription. I most solemnly protest against the attacks which are made here on the exercise of the right to criticise the acts and conduct of the Administration. It is a privilege we have and will maintain. We are the trustees of the people. We are sent here as the representatives of all classes, and not to represent factions. I trust, therefore, that gentlemen now, in this hour and in this crisis of our country, will rise above the mere politician and make some effort, at least, at statesmanship. I trust they will occupy a platform that lifts them above the mere local parlious, to a position that will enable them to look North, South, East, and West, to do the best we can for our whole country, and for all classes of the people.

I stand here in no spirit of faction. I do not care whether I am designated as a Democrat or as a Copperhead. It should be beneath the dignity of a national legislator to indulge in partisan epithets. Let us be men, and not slaves to faction. Let us be patriots, in the true sense of the term. Let us restore the country to its former position among the nations of the earth. Let us act in the best possible manner for the interests of the people and for all sections of the country. Let us show to the potentates of Europe and to all foreign Governments that the problem of self-government is not a failure, that there is still some wisdom in the national councils of America.

What is the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks?] Here we have a waif of $10,000,000 of commutation money. It is so much flotsam.

Here is $10,000,000 of money somewhere, and why not apply that sum first to raising volunteers before making the appropriation of $20,000,000? I am willing to appropriate the $10,000,000 raised under the conscription act, commonly known as commutation money, because the act provides that that money shall be used "for the procurement of substitutes." I want to pay those who volunteer liberally, so as to avoid all drafts. Let us fill the Army, if it must be done, with volunteers, for one volunteer is worth five drafted men; one volunteer is worth at least five of these compelled soldiers of the draft. It is said that we will have to pay these men. Of course we will. But we do not pay them bounty for the purpose of infusing patriotism into them. You do not put patriotism into a man because you pay him a few dollars. That money is necessary to keep their families whom they leave behind them when they go to suffer the hardships and dangers of the battle-field. We ought to be more than just—we ought to be generous to our volunteers. If necessary, we can raise a large army of volunteers. Let us give bounties for that purpose, and avoid odious conscriptions. Let us vote these $10,000,000, raised by commutation, first to that purpose. All we ask is that the money shall be placed under the control of some competent authority. Let us know how much is needed, and who is to expend it, and how it is to be disbursed. I trust that this money, now in the hands of the agents of the Administration, will be appropriated. Let us unite to restore our country to its former greatness, and the Government, under the Constitution, to its former glory and renown.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the committee rise to terminate the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FENXON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the pending amendment be closed in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FENXON in the chair.)

Mr. BROOKS. As my amendment has elicited, by the discussion which has taken place, the information needed, I now withdraw it.

Mr. HARDING. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the money aforesaid shall be applied to raising, arming, equipping, or paying of negro soldiers.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise, and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FENXON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the deficiency appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. HARDING submitted the following amendment:

Provided, That no part of the money aforesaid shall be applied to the raising, arming, equipping, or paying of negro soldiers.

Mr. STEVENS. Is that amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is; the joint resolution is open to amendment, no demand having been made for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bliss, James S. Brown, Cof-froth, Cox, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge-Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Marey, McKlincy, Wil-liam H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Yeaman—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Lloyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, De-ming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dunont, Eckley, Eliot, Eng-lish, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gauson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asael W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvia, McClurg, Mc-Indoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Mor-ris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Pike, Price, Rad-ford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Stebbins, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, William G. Steele, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valken-burgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wabley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—105.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF MISSOURI TROOPS.

Mr. BLOW. I move that the rules be sus-pended, and the House resolve itself into the Com-mittee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up the bill to pay the home guards of Missouri.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLOW. I hope the gentleman will with-draw that motion. It will not take five minutes to pass the bill.

Mr. COX. I suggest to my friend from Mis-souri that it will take more time than that. The report of the commissioners will have to be read. He had better let his bill come up the first thing to-morrow morning.

Mr. BLOW. Well, I yield.

Mr. SPALDING's motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 22, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a memorial of mid-shipmen at the United States Naval Academy at Newport, Rhode Island, remonstrating against the promotion of volunteer naval officers to corresponding grades in the regular service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COWAN. I present a petition of officers and soldiers of Pennsylvania volunteers, praying for an increase of the pay of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the Army of the United States. As that subject is now under consideration, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I offer a petition from Bishop Eastburn, of the diocese of Massachusetts. It is very brief, and I ask leave to read it.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

This petition of the subscribers, bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, humbly sheweth:

That your petitioners are charged, by the laws of their church, with the oversight and care of the clergy and can-didates for holy orders of their several dioceses; and feel under obligations the most imperative to provide, as far as possible, that they be confined to their appropriate work, and encouraged to pursue it with all simplicity and dili-gence. They cannot speak in behalf of members of other communions, but they would hope and pray that the privi-lege which, in a certain contingency, they most respect-fully invoke at your hands, may be extended to all those who, in any communion, are commissioned to minister in holy things.

It is proposed, they understand, to repeal the commu-tation clause in the late law ordering a draft for the military service of the Government at this most important crisis of the nation's history. The effect of this repeal, if unac-companied with any alternative provision, would be to subject all clergymen and candidates for holy orders to the necessity of bearing arms, unless they were able to pur-chase substitutes, a thing far beyond the pecuniary ability of the great majority of their number. This necessity is at variance with their fundamental duties and vows as min-isters and students for the ministry of the Prince of peace, and ought not, as your petitioners conceive, to be laid upon them, except, perhaps, in case of the direst extremity. They have beheld, with inexpressible grief, one of their own order gridding on the sword in the cause of the rebel-lion, and have seen, with shame, his example followed by others of different grades in the ministry.

They pray your honorable body that the law, if altered, shall provide that clergymen, and candidates for the min-istry, formally recognized as such by the authorities of their respective denominations, and actually engaged in clerical studies, shall be regarded as non-combatants, and employed as chaplains, or in hospitals, or some kindred occupations; or else that a certain sum shall be levied upon every clerg-yman and candidate for the ministry, as above described, or every denomination liable to draft, unless he chooses to be enrolled.

I have a similar petition from Bishop Chase, of New Hampshire, and one of the same character from Bishop Whittingham, of Maryland. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

They were so referred.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of George S. P. Bradford, an ordnance sergeant in the Army, praying that the pay of ordnance sergeants may be defined and fixed by law; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Walters, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FOOT. I move that leave be given to with-draw the petition and papers on the files of the Senate in relation to the claim of Charles F. An-derson, in order to have them presented to the House of Representatives. I make the motion at the request of a member of that House.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, reported it without amend-ment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Print-ing, to whom was referred a motion to print addi-tional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the national finances be print-ed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I am instructed by the Com-mittee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of J. O. Armes, to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of that claim, with a view of the petitioner presenting the papers to the House of Representatives, where a part of the papers already are.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of New York to promote volunteering, and asking that the pay of privates in the Army may be increased to twenty dollars a month, reported in favor of printing the resolutions; and the report was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be added to the standing committees of the Senate a Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to consist of nine members.

WASHINGTON AND NEW YORK MAILS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to communicate to the Senate the reason of the frequent failure of the mails between New York and Washington; also what legislation is necessary in order to remedy the existing evils; and especially if a new railroad be not required for the necessities of the postal service.

INDIAN REGIMENTS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to the Senate the names of the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments, the date of their several appointments, and the date they were severally mustered out of the service of the United States.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. SUMNER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States.

Mr. POMEROY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the Government to assume and reimburse the State of Kansas for moneys paid for territorial indebtedness, and have the same applied to the liquidation of the direct tax of the State.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted informally an amendment to the bill (S. No. 18) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 14) to supply, in part, deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties and premiums to volunteers; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 27) concerning members of Congress; which was read, and passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no other morning business to be submitted, the question before the Senate in the morning hour is on excusing the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] from further service upon the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the further consideration of that question be postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To any particular time?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Indefinitely?

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WILSON. A joint resolution has just come from the House of Representatives which I should like to have taken up and acted upon at once.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties and premiums to volunteers, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. This is a very simple proposition. It is a resolution which contains one of the sections of the bill which we had under consideration yesterday. It is very important that it should be acted upon at once, and I do not think it is necessary to refer it to any committee. I should like to have it read in full for the information of Senators.

The joint resolution was read. It proposes to appropriate $50,000 to supply deficiencies in part in the appropriations for the public printing; and also to appropriate $20,000,000, or so much of that sum as may be required, for the payment of bounties, advance pay, and premiums for soldiers volunteering or enlisting in the service of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the small appropriation in the first item of the joint resolution is needed to pay a deficiency in the printing appropriation. That is right; the obligation has been incurred. The other portion of the resolution, making an appropriation of $20,000,000, is substantially the same as the third section of the bill which was before us yesterday. There is in it, however, a provision applying the money to bounties, advance pay, and premiums for recruiting. It was thought yesterday that it was rather doubtful whether we ought to pass the second section of the bill then under consideration, authorizing these premiums; and if Senators so believe, we can strike out the word "premiums" from this resolution; pass it with that amendment, and let it go back to the other House to be acted upon. In order to make the matter certain, I move to strike out the word "premiums."

Mr. FESSENDEN. The first question, I suppose, is on taking up the resolution for consideration now.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that it be now taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this joint resolution at the present time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the amendment is presented I will state that in regard to the first item of this resolution, which appropriates $50,000 for the purpose of printing, the Superintendent states that, owing to the enormous quantity of printing that was called for by the Departments, the appropriation has been exhausted, and he is now absolutely without money to pay the workmen in his office; and it is necessary, therefore, that an appropriation be made immediately. I see no objection to it, and I do not see any necessity for a reference to a committee in order to understand it. It is very simple, and I presume the chairman of the Committee on Printing is aware of the state of facts. The case is as I have stated it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In regard to the other part of the resolution, the Senate has already become familiar with it from the fact that we had it under discussion yesterday. It is merely an appropriation of $20,000,000, instead of the $105,000,000, to meet the obligations already incurred. I do not know that there is any objection to that. So far as I am individually concerned, I stated yesterday that I was willing the obligations incurred by the Government so far should be met. I see no other way, in fact, than either to pay what they have promised to pay, or in good faith discharge the soldiers enlisted under it, which nobody thinks of doing, I suppose, and therefore we must meet the other alternative. As to the premium, the Senate will of course judge for itself about that. It is very easy to amend the resolution by striking that out, if it be desired, and sending the resolution back to the House of Representatives in that shape.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is in lines eleven, twelve, and thirteen; to strike out—

"and premiums for soldiers volunteering or enlisting in the service of the United States;"

so that the clause will read:

That the sum of $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be required, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the payment of bounties and advance pay.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is always unpleasant and invidious to oppose this class of legislation; but this resolution involves a great deal more than even the $20,000,000 appropriated by it. If this resolution be passed, the bill that was under consideration yesterday need not be and probably will not be passed for some time. By this resolution we not only appropriate $20,000,000, but we legalize the proclamation of the Secretary of War of last October, and we authorize the payment of $105,000,000 in bounties, $6,000,000 in premiums, and other incidental expenses. Now, I tell Senators seriously that it is impossible to raise this sum of money within the time contemplated by this scheme. It is easy for us to appropriate the money; we may appropriate $100,000,000; and Senators seem to think that is the cheapest and the best way; but I wish to call their attention to the difficulty, under the circumstances by which we are surrounded, of raising this money. Suppose you pledge the Government to pay this large bounty; what then? You may make the pledge; but suppose the money is not on hand at the time the pledge is to be redeemed; what then becomes of the credit of the Government? Is it safe or is it right for us to put these serious burdens on the Government? I do not speak my own opinions alone on this subject; I speak the opinions of those who know better than I the condition of our financial system. I say to Senators that if they contemplate raising an army of three hundred thousand men by the payment of national bounties out of the Treasury of the United States under the system proposed yesterday, we cannot pay the money, and we shall induce men to enter our armies under false pretenses. We might as well look at it plainly and fairly in the face. To require within three months the payment of so large a sum of money, without providing any mode of taxation, I say is impossible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Put on a proviso there.

Mr. SHERMAN. You may do that. So far as the pledge of the Government to those who have enlisted under the faith of that proclamation is concerned, I do not see very well how we can avoid it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better put on a proviso limiting it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But if it is proposed to extend this system further, and raise our armies by national bounties, I say that we shall meet with financial difficulties, and we shall make a pledge that we cannot redeem; and I, for one, prefer to choose the unpopular attitude of opposing these national bounties at the outset, rather than to deceive any class of men by promising what I fear we shall not be able to perform.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether the resolution, as it stands, appropriating $20,000,000, was not intended, as it came from the House of Representatives, to pay what is called the "premium." It is so, in so many words, as I understand it. The aggregate of the premium, as I have understood, would be about six million dollars; and if we strike out the premium, we have $6,000,000 more for bounties than are necessary.

Mr. WILSON. I will say, in regard to this sum of money, that it was suggested that we should appropriate $30,000,000; and the bill we had up yesterday was originally prepared for $30,000,000. It was thought that would be necessary to cover the case; but on further consultation with the Secretary of War and other persons, it was thought best to put the sum at $20,000,000, which is provided for in the third section of the bill which was under consideration yesterday:

That the sum of $20,000,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in payment of the bounties and premiums authorized by this act.

We can amend it so as to make it read. "that $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for the purpose of paying bounties."

Mr. JOHNSON. It would avoid the difficulty, if those words were in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make a suggestion. I think the question made by the Senator from Ohio ought to be met, and met here at once. I fully concur in all that he has said. I propose, if the amendment which has been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts shall be adopted, as I hope it will be, to move another amendment, to add a proviso to the section:

Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be paid to any persons who may be enlisted after the 5th day of January next.

That will bring it within the principle of the bill yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of that would be to confine the bounties to those already enlisted?

Mr. FESSENDEN. To those already enlisted and those who may be enlisted before the 5th of January.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now propose to amend the resolution by adding this proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be paid to any persons who may be enlisted after the 5th day of January next.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask that the joint resolution may be laid aside for a moment. I do not know but that it may need another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Subsequently Mr. FESSENDEN said: I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment I offered was adopted, for the purpose of presenting another in lieu of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes to modify the amendment which has just been agreed to by the Senate. It will be regarded as before the Senate, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That no bounties, except such as are now provided by law, shall be paid to any person enlisted after the 5th day of January next.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to that modification, if the objection be in time. That will involve the very question discussed yesterday, and will surely delay the passage of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on reconsidering the vote of the Senate by which it agreed to the amendment in its original form. The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine now proposes to amend his original amendment so that it will read:

Provided, That no bounties, except such as are now provided by law, shall be paid to any person enlisted after the 5th day of January next.

The question is on agreeing to that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. If it is in order, I will move to amend that, by striking out the "5th day of January" and inserting the "2d day of February."

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is an amendment to an amendment. The Senator from Maine moves to amend his original amendment, and no further amendment is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. He modifies his amendment, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana was understood as objecting to the modification, and it therefore required a vote. Is the Chair right?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The proposition of the Senator from New York brings us back to the question, whether we are prepared to say that we will pay $100,000,000 for bounties, as we shall probably have to do if we extend the time to February; and if so, where we are to raise the money to discharge our obligations. I will only say to the Senate that if we propose to go on in that way we shall involve our Treasury in difficulties from which it will be impossible to extricate it. That is my judgment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I see that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and other members of that committee, are alarmed, and I have no doubt they are sincerely alarmed, with reference to the means of paying these bounties. But, sir, it seems to me that we are approaching a point where we may as well look the thing squarely in the face. The question is, whether we shall dispense with recruiting; whether we shall say to the three years' men whose times are about expiring, "we cannot give you the bounty promised in the proclamation of the 17th of October;" we must arrest all volunteering; we must say to the country and the world, "we have not the means to pay bounties any more; we must rely entirely upon drafting;" for that is the object of this proposition. As soon as Congress passes it, if I understand its effect, it immediately arrests all volunteering. Are we prepared to say that to the country? I do not understand finances very well; but, in my judgment, the cheapest mode of raising an army will be by bounties.

We all agree that we must have our Army replenished; we must have a large portion of these three hundred thousand men, and we ought to have them, within the next sixty days. Sir, we can get them by going on with this system of recruiting. We all know that recruiting is now going on rapidly in most parts of the country, and if it can be continued even until the 2d of February, we shall get a very respectable army; but if we arrest it now, and turn the Government over to the system of drafting, we know from experience that we have little to expect for several months at any rate from that source. We may as well look this question in the face. If we have not the means and cannot raise the means for paying bounties to enlisted soldiers, let us say so to the country, and stop recruiting; but depend upon it, our Army is not to be filled up in time for the spring campaign by a draft. I am in favor of going on with recruiting. We have just got well started with that system. Let it go on for thirty days more, and let us replenish our armies. I have no doubt myself but what the means can be obtained for paying these bounties.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if this was simply a question as to which was the cheaper mode of raising an army, I might agree with the Senator from New York that it was cheaper and better to raise soldiers by the payment of large bounties; but that is not the question. The question is, whether we are probably able to raise the money we pledge by this law. What means are in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury? He has no authority to issue any more greenbacks, as they are called. That authority is limited to the $400,000,000 now outstanding. Indeed, if he had the authority, it would not be wise to exercise it, for the simple reason that a larger inflation of our currency would tend to raise prices and increase the expenses of the war. The experience of the rebels and the experience of all nations show that it is unwise to increase the national circulation, or increase the national debt in the form of circulation.

The only way, then, to raise this money is by borrowing, by selling our bonds in the market. Experience has shown that only a certain amount of those bonds can be sold. No security can possibly be better than what is called the fifty-two loan. It is a loan that is secure, and every one feels that to its ultimate payment the last dollar and the last cent is secured. We pay six per cent. interest in gold upon it; it yields a large return to those who invest in it; and yet that loan, the most favorable one we could possibly issue, is only absorbed in the ordinary operations of the Treasury Department at the rate of about $6,000,000 per week. That, then, is the extent to which we can borrow money probably. How else would you borrow money? Would you throw your bonds in the market and force loans? In that you would depreciate the sale of your bonds and destroy your national credit. There is a limit beyond which neither a nation nor an individual can go in the expenditure of money. It is easy for men or nations to say, "it is cheaper to do so and so;" but they must have the means to do what they propose to do. I say, as a question of plain finance—it is not a question of difficulty—that we must not increase our expenditures one dollar beyond our ability to raise the money to pay, and I do not see at present how it is possible to get more in the way of loans than the amount we are now receiving, probably from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000 per week, sufficient, with the ordinary income of the Government, to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government.

This proposition, limited as it is by the Senator from Maine, will probably be paid by $20,000,000; but if it is left unlimited, and you rely upon large bounties to fill up your armies, the three hundred thousand men called for will confessedly cost $105,000,000, the great portion of which must be paid in hand by the terms of the proclamation, and then $6,000,000 are required for this premium fund, together with other sums for other matters. Now, where can we raise this money? If we had the money in the Treasury, I would agree that it would be better for the nation at large to pay these bounties. If, on the other hand, we pursue the policy that has been heretofore adopted, of paying but small bounties, localities, counties, towns, and States will raise these bounties. In every community they are doing it. They have done it in the past. When this war commenced we raised enormous levies, you may say, without any bounties at all. Even the $100 bounty promised them was not to be paid until the end of the war.

I say, therefore, we have arrived at that condition when we must appeal to the physical resources of the country by means of a draft; and I believe this war will never end until the people of the United States are willing to see enforced a fair conscription law, or an enrollment law, or a militia law; I do not care what you call it. It seems to me that the War Department, in the execution of the law passed by Congress at the last session, delayed and procrastinated it, and excited the very opposition which they complained of against that law. It took them three months to appoint the agents to execute that law. If I remember correctly, we were hurried in the passage of that law by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, because it was necessary to put it into immediate operation. We passed it before the close of the session, and it was nearly three months before they had the agents appointed to execute the law. It seems to me they might have selected the provost marshals and the various agents to execute the law in thirty days, because they had here the means of information as to the best persons to execute the law; but it was delayed nearly three months, and then one locality was taken. Instead of having the draft universal all over the country at the same time, they first took the city of New York—I believe that was the first place taken—the place where the draft was the most severe, where it was the most unpopular, where the political sentiments of a portion of the community were most obnoxious to the execution of the law; and then, when it was resisted in New York, they delayed and hesitated. Why, sir, in the State of Ohio, while we were engaged in an animated canvass, the people everywhere asked, "why do they not enforce the draft?" Nobody complained of it. It might have been enforced in Ohio—my colleague will agree with me in this remark—to the last man without resistance. That is my deliberate judgment; but it was delayed and delayed, until in October last they promised these large bounties.

Well, sir, if we have the money, I am willing to pay them. I am willing to pay the last dollar and to give the last man to carry on the war; but the question is whether we have the ability to pay; whether we ought to make promises until we know we have the money. We have the power by enforcing the conscription law to raise men. We have not the power to borrow money faster than the people will lend it to us. If Senators are willing to come forward and say, I am willing to lend you this sum of money, or I will raise this sum of money in this or that way, or propose some way by which it can be raised, then I will agree with them, but until then I am not in favor of these large bounties. Perhaps the view this subject presents to me is rather limited. I never like to indulge in promises until I have the money to pay them, and then I am willing to be as munificent as any one; but until we have this money, or until I see a place where we can borrow it, I do not like to promise soldiers large bounties, involving so large an expenditure.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the embarrassments under which we labor grow out of the effort to pursue a mixed system for the raising of troops. During the last session of Congress, I favored what was called the conscription bill, or rather the enrollment bill, because I believed that was the most equitable and just mode of raising troops. The Administration, instead of applying the law, as proposed by Congress, for raising troops, set off to mix it up with another system of paying enormous bounties: hence the difficulty which is now presented to Congress to reconcile the two systems. I believed at the commencement of the war, as I now do, that if it was necessary to raise men for the defense of the country, all men and all portions of the country should contribute equally; and I have been opposed to this system of subsidy in paying enormous bounties. I do not believe that the question ever has been in relation to the men; I believe it has been purely a money question; and I think to-day that the success of the prosecution of this war depends more upon our ability to carry the country through the financial crisis than it does upon the question of raising men.

I have been opposed to mixing up the two systems. When this matter was before the Military Committee, I voted for the third section of the bill yesterday under consideration, which appropriates $20,000,000 for the payment of the bounty, and the premium, up to the 5th day of January next, simply to redeem a pledge which had been made by the Government to the men who had enlisted. There was no authority on the part of the executive authorities to make any such pledge, or to bind the Government to pay men $400 bounty, without any recognition of law for such an act; yet, inasmuch as they had seen proper to adopt it, to prevent difficulty and complaints in the Army, I went to the extent of voting the $20,000,000. An amendment was adopted yesterday extending the time to the 2d of February, and if the result is to be what Senators on this floor claim for the volunteer system, by the 2d of February three hundred thousand men will have been raised. They say that we should resort to and depend upon volunteering entirely, notwithstanding that we have upon our statute-book the enrollment act, and all the cumbersome and expensive machinery for its execution all over the country; and although we are to keep that in operation, we are to turn round and pay from $300 to $400 bounty. One system or the other should be abolished; one or the other should be relied upon; and, as I stated before, I have been in favor of the system which conscripts a certain number from the community who owe service to the Government.

Now, if, as is proposed, and if the principle which is initiated by Senators here is true, the Army can be filled up under a system of bounties, the next question which recurs is, what amount is to be required to carry that system out? I have made a calculation—to be sure, not upon any very correct data, but upon what I suppose will be something near a correct result. Suppose that by the 2d day of February, as these Senators claim, the Army will be filled under the volunteer system which has been adopted by the Department; suppose that one hundred thousand veterans reenlist at a bounty of $400 each. You have there $40,000,000 to commence with. Suppose that you enlist two hundred thousand others at $300 each, you have there $60,000,000 additional. Then, under the clause which was in the bill under consideration yesterday, and which has not been stricken out of the resolution coming to us from the other House, you have a premium of fifteen dollars for veterans, which amounts to $1,500,000 more, and you have a premium of ten dollars for other recruits, amounting to $2,000,000 more. Thus, in the aggregate, the sum which is necessary to be appropriated, and which must be incorporated in this bill, if this system is relied upon, is $103,500,000.

I have voted steadily against these propositions, and I am disposed to vote against them to-day. I defer very much to the judgment and experience of older and much abler Senators here; but I do not believe that the two systems can be successfully mixed up, neither do I believe it is good policy to adopt this expensive system while we have a provision upon our statute-book with a cumbersome and expensive machinery for raising troops. The effect of bringing the two systems in conflict will be damaging, and I do not believe that the resources and the revenue of the country at this time will warrant the disbursement of so large an amount as $103,500,000. I shall vote against all such measures as mere financial questions, and shall vote for, and continue to support, the enforcement of the enrollment act, believing that that is the most fair, just, and equitable way of raising men, and at the same time relieving the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. I want to cooperate with the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Ohio in the purpose they seem to be driving at; and, after all, I wish the Senator from Maine would allow his amendment to stand as he originally proposed it. I understand this is an appropriation bill, and the amendment, as proposed by the Senator from Maine, restricts the Treasury in the disbursement of the appropriation, and restricts them sufficiently. The modification of the amendment conflicts with a purpose that I have in view, and which I stated yesterday. When the proper bill comes up, I want to submit to the Senate amendments which I think will enable the Government to pay bounties and relieve the burden which they throw upon the soldier, and not put any burden upon the Treasury, not take the money out of the Treasury; and I stated yesterday how I designed to have this done; and the amendment, as it is now proposed by the Senator, conflicts with that. It seems to me the bill will be abundantly safe if we put to it the amendment which was first proposed. There is now no law for paying these bounties, and the Government will be disgraced and dishonored if we do not appropriate this amount; and after we have intimated to the Government, as we do by the amendment first proposed, that it is our purpose, after the 5th of January, that no bounties shall be paid, and certainly not out of this appropriation, I do not think they will promise any bounties. I do not think there is the slightest danger of their laying the people of the United States under any further obligations in that direction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I had precisely that idea when I drew the first amendment; and it does effectively, as the Senator from Wisconsin observes, prevent the appropriation or the use of any part of these $20,000,000 for the purpose of paying bounties to persons enlisted after the 5th day of January next. The difficulty, however, that struck my mind is this: the order from the Department is general, a continuing order; it is a promise to pay to all persons who may be enlisted. Now, if they do not choose to revoke that order, or let it stand, they will go on after the 5th day of January enlisting persons, and we are then precisely in the condition that we are in now. The promise has been made by the executive Government, and we are called upon to fulfill it. It is impossible to say how long it would take to mature and pass a bill through both branches, with the contest that exists on this question, which should effectually provide for all these cases. It may linger on, and enlistments keep going on, until the 2d day of February, or after that time, for aught we can know. Now, sir, I do not know how far the Government would feel itself bound, or would take any hint from our simple language, that no part of this money shall be used to pay for future enlistments. Probably no part of it would be so used in any case, for the simple reason that there would not be enough of it to meet more than existing obligations. We should be left therefore precisely as we were before, and as we are now. They may go on, and before we can pass a bill these same obligations may be incurred to a very much larger extent than they are now, so that we gain nothing. If my friend's bill will accomplish the purpose, and he can come under any pledge to get it through before the 5th day of January, I should accede to his logic and be prepared to act according to his wishes. But, sir, I want the executive Government to understand, and I think it is very reasonable that they should be made to understand, that when there is a law upon the statute-book, and a particular course pointed out for raising men, and a particular sum fixed to be paid for men, in the absence of a very pressing emergency, it is not a part of the duty of the executive Government to make laws overturning ours, and adopting new ones of their own suggestion, and to make promises that they cannot perform and that will bind us. That is my notion about it. It is what Congress owes to itself in almost any position of things in the country.

I say, moreover, that I think the Government in this particular were led into this course by a simple error of calculation. When the promise was first made, or the order passed, it was their idea the $300 paid in as commutation would meet the other enlistments, so that they would not be contravening any law at all. I presume that was the idea on which they went; but the enlistments coming in so much faster than the exemptions has occasioned the difficulty in which we are now placed. Hence I do not find any fault with the Government, either with the President or the Secretary of War. I am not disposed to throw blame upon them in any way in reference to it. The country needs the men, and they acted, according to the best of their judgment, for the good of the country and to accomplish the purpose. I have therefore no particular fault to find. I only say that the event has shown that they did not make their calculations correctly; and now we are brought to this position.

Laws should exist in regard to all these things; matters of this kind should be left to the discretion of no department on the face of the earth; we, the Congress of the United States, are the body to settle all these questions, in the absence of any great and pressing emergency calling for action before Congress can meet; and in that case I hold, as I have held before, that it is the duty of the Executive, in defense of the Constitution and the laws, to meet such an emergency and take the consequences. He would not be doing his duty if he did not do so without reference to particular rules; but in all other cases they are bound to defer to what the wisdom or the folly of the Congress of the United States shall say is the proper course to take. In reference to this matter I want them to act under the law of the land, and when we say that we appropriate this money to enable them to discharge these obligations, or such as may be incurred previous to the 5th day of January next, we say at the same time there is no law in existence for paying these bounties beyond that day, and you must not contravene the laws of the land in that respect.

The only question, then, is whether we can say it safely. If we cannot say it safely, let us stay here and legislate, instead of being in a hurry to eat our Christmas dinners somewhere else than in Washington, and place a law on the statute-book that will give them leave to pay this money. If we are willing to pay $400 to veterans and $300 to persons who are not veterans, let us place such a provision on the statute-book, and let them act under law, and not adjourn or take a recess, and let the Departments feel themselves at liberty to go on and make laws for the occasion during the time that Congress is absolutely not only in existence but in session, or ought to be in session. If gentlemen are not prepared to do this, and say that the law shall not be contravened, then let them stay here and make a law to meet it, and not leave it at loose ends in this way.

Now, sir, as to the main question, I say to the Senate that, in my humble judgment—and I pretend to no exemption from error on all these questions—if they go on legislating upon this principle with regard to paying these enormous bounties, they will find that they are exhausting the fountain and coming nearer to the point where they are obliged to stop than they are aware of. Gentlemen may talk here about paying these great bounties, and may say that you cannot get the men in any other way. Very well; if that is true, if the men must be had, and there is no other way in which you can get them, pay them; but pay them by statute, give laws for it, and let it not be done by the exercise of individual authority at one end of the avenue or the other. But, sir, in my judgment there is another way; Congress deliberately decided that there was another mode, and I have believed from the beginning, and believe now, that it is the best mode, the most equal, the most just upon the community; and that is by draft, calling upon all persons who are subject to it to take their chance; and by enforcing that with vigor and determination you will accomplish your purpose. The reason why you fail is because you show to the country that you have not nerve enough to carry out what you decide to be the best thing to be done. Show that you have the courage, and the people will sustain you; because, in my judgment, drawn from some experience and observation, the American people trust no men more than those who they see not only have calmness enough to devise a plan, but courage enough to execute it after they have devised it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Maine that it is our business to enact laws, and it is the business of those agents at the other end of the avenue to execute laws when they are enacted. I will stand by him as long as he pleases to stand; in doing battle for the utmost line and letter of the prerogatives of this body, and I defer entirely to his judgment. If he thinks this express enactment is necessary to prevent the executive department of the Government from pledging the credit of the nation to these extravagant bounties, notwithstanding the very pregnant suggestion made by the amendment as first proposed, I have not a word to say against it. I desire to rescue the nation from the liability to be incumbered with this mountain of debt without any provision made for it by their representatives; and if this express enactment is thought by any Senator here to be necessary, I submit to it entirely. I thought we might get along without it; it will not embarrass us next week; it will not embarrass the very legislation that I propose. That I admit; and if it will protect us in any direction I waive the request I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "provided," and to insert "that no bounties, except such as are now provided by law, shall be paid to any persons enlisted after the 5th day of January next."

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to inquire from some gentleman who has given this subject care and attention, in what way it is proposed to procure the reentry into the Army of those veterans whose term of service will expire in June and July next. As I understand, it is a sine quâ non that these men should be retained, and I desire now to attract the attention of the Senate to that question, how it is possible to procure their reenry or reenlistment into the service at the time that their present term of service will expire; whether the offer of large bounties such as were contemplated by the War Department was not calculated to secure that object, and whether it can be secured in any other way.

Mr. SHERMAN. In reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will state that I believe the time of the earliest of those regiments expires in August.

Mr. COWAN. The time of some of ours will expire in June.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had, at first, all three months' men, for some time, and I think it was July or August, 1861, before the three years' men came in. Between now and next July or August, we shall have ample time to legislate in regard to those veteran regiments.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state, furthermore, for the information of the Senator from Pennsylvania, (though I cannot speak as to the troops of the Potomac army,) that there is a very small portion of the western troops whose terms expire next year. Of the older regiments who went into the service two years ago last fall, a very large portion, probably eight out of ten, are already out of the service in some way or other, from casualties or from discharges. The majority of the regiments which we raised one year ago last fall are much fuller, and their time does not expire for two years.

Mr. COLLAMER. My State has none but three years' troops in the field, and has never sent any two years' men. Our first regiment of those in service for three years was in the Bull Run fight in July, 1861, and the term of that regiment will expire next June. There is one whole brigade, in which that regiment is, whose time will expire next summer from June to August. There are five regiments in that brigade.

Mr. GRIMES. How many men?

Mr. COLLAMER. According to the last report of them, made about a month ago, they averaged about five hundred to a regiment. Then we have six more regiments that are in different departments—not in the same brigade, but scattered about the country—who were raised in the fall, in September, October, and November. About half our men go out in the summer, and the others in the fall.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will simply state that the object of this proviso is merely to declare that nothing further shall be done without law. If the Congress of the United States shall be asked to decide upon the terms on which the veterans shall reenlist, let a fair opportunity be given for legislation on that subject, and we can do in regard to it what Congress thinks proper. This proviso is only saying that in regard to this present thing, as the law stands now, they must stop where they are.

Mr. COWAN. I heartily agree with that sentiment. I have long been impressed with the importance of confining the several departments of this Government strictly within the sphere of their operations according to law; and I believe that the failure of the first draft under the act of 1861 was entirely owing to the fact that they disregarded a section of that law which, in my judgment at the time, was material, and one which was calculated to insure success.

Mr. JOHNSON and others. What was that?

Mr. COWAN. I will state. It was given out by the Department, though plainly not in the enactment, that any one who refused to appear at the rendezvous after having been drafted would be compelled absolutely to go at once and fill out the term of service, and would not have an opportunity of applying to be exempted. The consequence was, that the timid men, the men not fit to be soldiers, those who would not be worth anything in the Army if they were soldiers, were obliged, under the pressure of this decision, to pay immense sums for substitutes. It begat a new class of merchant in the country, called the "substitute broker;" brought the law into odium; brought the service into odium; and prevented the proper number of men being obtained under that draft.

The same mischief substantially has occurred under the present draft. Under the first draft, having found that there was a deficiency in the quota called for, instead of going on and drawing and filling it up and finding the recusants, they stopped, and they sent, say if you please one hundred thousand men, upon an errand which they alleged would require three hundred thousand for its proper execution. So it was under the present law. I could never see any reason, for my part, why, under the present draft, when it was found that after the first drawing there was a deficiency in the quota, an additional number should not have been immediately drawn, and a sufficient number drawn in order to fill it up. But it seems the Department after having made one drawing supposed that exhausted their authority; and when they came to count up their exemptions and those who paid the commutation money, there was a very small result remaining.

I think that all the laws we have passed would have been efficient if, as has been remarked by the Senator from Maine, they had been carried out manfully and boldly, and the people had been trusted with them. They could have been executed everywhere that I know of, except perhaps in the city of New York, and there the disturbance was soon quelled when the proper means were made use of to quell it. I think it unfortunate that we did not have in the first place some uniform mode, whether it might be one mode or two modes, of filling up the Army, but I think it should have been uniform, and that it should have been fair. I think it would be exceedingly unfair now to the veteran who has borne the heat and the burden of this struggle, that his place should be replaced in the Army by one who had to be tolled there by excessive bounties and increased pay. I think that if it took us ten days, we ought to endeavor by some means or other to place the old soldiers of the Army on an equal footing with those who now propose to go in at the eleventh hour. I should like some plan to be devised by which that could be done. I should feel very reluctant to vote for any measure which was calculated to make a distinction between those who have borne our arms so long and with so much credit to the Government.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this debate clearly shows us the importance of being very careful how we act. We are warned by the Senator from Ohio, who is on the Committee on Finance, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the Government has not the means to redeem the pledges the Government has made, and that we ought not to extend this time beyond the 5th day of January. Sir, we want men; we want our armies filled; but we ought not to make pledges for bounties or increase of pay, if we have not the means to redeem our pledges. If we increase our expenses in raising men, or in paying men, we ought to provide the means to meet the promises we make to them. Sir, it seems to me that we ought to put upon the country a direct tax, a tax upon the property of the country, to fill up the ranks of our armies, to increase the pay we give our soldiers who sustain the cause of the country. There is no reason, in my judgment, why we should not have such a tax early and promptly imposed, and thus sustain the Treasury and the credit of the Government.

The Senator from Ohio tells us that we ought not to consult popularity in our action here. I agree with the Senator that we ought to pay no attention whatever, in this crisis of the country, to the question whether our course here shall be popular or unpopular. Let us for the sake of popularity to-day commit a grave error, let us involve the country in difficulty, and in six or twelve months hence the popularity won to-day will turn into dishonor and disgrace. For myself, sir, I do not care a farthing what the people of my State or of any portion of the country choose to say in regard to our action here; in this great crisis of the nation. We should take the responsibility, and do our duty with a single eye to saving our country and preserving our institutions. The soldier may as well shrink from danger in the hour of trial, as for the public man to shrink from the duty of this hour of responsibility.

I suppose the War Department, in the pledge it made in the call for three hundred thousand volunteers, supposed, that by fixing a time and notifying the people of the States that they wanted three hundred thousand men by the 5th day of January, a great effort would be made by the States, the cities, counties, and towns, and by the people to enlist men, and that a portion of those men would be thus raised—not the whole three hundred thousand, for I take it the Government did not dream of raising three hundred thousand volunteers in the present condition of the country, to go into the Army. The Government thought that a great effort would be made, and that we should get several thousand volunteers. We had then I think about nine million dollars, when the call was made, and we provided that a small sum of this bounty should be paid when the recruit was taken into the service, and so much at different periods afterwards through the three years. It was thought that the sum of money then on hand, derived from the commutation clause of the enrollment act, would enable the Government to pass along until the meeting of Congress. The Government intended on the 5th day of January to commence the draft, and expected to derive from that draft many million dollars to pay for recruiting.

The committee propose to fix the 5th day of January, the day the Government itself had fixed for the draft. We propose to arrest the payment of this bounty on that day, and that is the amendment now proposed upon this House resolution. It is proposed by some Senators to go on until the 2d day of February. When we have the fact before us clear and plain that we need some legislation in regard to the enrollment act and in regard to filling up the armies, it seems to me a stern public duty to remain in our seats and pass the necessary legislation. But, sir, unless we do it, I think we ought to extend the time from the 5th of January until the 20th of the month, so that when we come back here after the 5th day of the month we shall have a few days in which to pass the necessary legislation to amend the enrollment act.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is troubled very much in regard to how we are to retain the old veterans in the service if the Government does not offer this bounty. I take it, if we were to make a draft for half a million of men, commencing early next month or on the 1st day of February, we should hold two hundred thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand or three hundred thousand of those men. At least one half of those men, if we do not repeal the commutation clause, would pay the $300, and a large and overwhelming majority of them at any rate, would get substitutes, and they would obtain substitutes from the Army. The townships, the counties, the States, the men drafted, would look to the ranks of the Army, to the old veterans, from among whom to obtain substitutes. That is already authorized by the Department, and we can legalize it if it be necessary; we can authorize the old veterans in the Army who have served over two years to be substitutes. We are doing that now. A veteran in the Army now, that has served more than two years, may enlist in that way, and they are enlisting. There is a regiment from my State, directly across the river, in which several hundred of them have already enlisted for a bounty of $727—the bounty promised them by the nation is $402, and our State bounty is $325, making $727. Those from my State who have been in the Army over two years, to the number of ten or twelve thousand, can reenlist and receive a bounty of $727.

Mr. HARRIS. How will it be after the 5th of January?

Mr. WILSON. After the 5th of January they will receive the bounty of $325 from the State, and just as much as anybody who is drafted chooses to pay them, if it is $2,000.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no law now allowing them to become substitutes.

Mr. WILSON. There is a regulation of the Department under which they do it now, and we can pass such a law, if it be necessary to do so, to retain these old veterans in the service. I have no sort of fear about the reenlistment of the veterans in the service. They will have offered to their sufficient inducements to reënter the Army if high bounties can do it, especially if we repeal the $300 clause of the enrollment act. I venture to say that if we do repeal that clause, and the Government allows veteran soldiers who have been in the Army two years or more to reenlist as substitutes, the average bounty offered to these men will be, within thirty days after the draft commences, at least twelve hundred dollars. A great many of them will reenlist and go into the service under the enormous bounties paid for substitutes if you repeal the $300 clause, which, however, I do not think you will do, although I know that is now the idea in the country. Nineteen twentieths of the people of this country would vote against the repeal of that clause. The public sentiment of this nation is for that $300 clause by an overwhelming majority. The people have learned that it has operated practically as a relief for the poor, toiling, laboring man, and that all that was said against it as a measure in favor of the rich and against the poor was either misconception or intentional misrepresentation or misrepresentation. I hope it is not to be repealed.

Sir, I think the true way is to fix a reasonable limit to the payment of this money, making it say about the 20th day of January. Appropriate the money, and then stay here and amend the enrollment act and pass all other acts necessary by way of legislation to fill up the Army, and then I would let the $300 clause stand in the act. It will keep down the wild speculation for substitutes. I would go on drafting until I had drafted seven hundred thousand or eight hundred thousand men if necessary, and I would hold every man drafted if he was not absolutely physically unfitted for the service. If he was able to contribute to the support of the Government in any way, I would make him do so; I would make him serve or pay his $300; and then I would allow the States, the counties, the towns, and individuals, to raise, wherever our armies go, black men and white men as recruits, and if they pay them bounties, put the white men into the ranks of our old regiments wherever they go in the field, making good soldiers of them at once, and let them serve our country. I would take the black men and organize them into companies and regiments. I would thus put all the burden I could on that section of the country.

I tell you, sir, our conscription act has done more to raise and elevate the sentiment of this nation than any other act we have passed. When that act was passed, you had a wild, unreasoning prejudice against using a black man to fight the battles of our country. But when people who were filled with these prejudices saw that they must go themselves, and bare their bosoms to the shot and shell of the enemy, they learned that the black man's blood was no more sacred than their own, and that they would as soon have a black man stand up and fight the battles of the country as to do it themselves. The most popular thing to-day is to crowd black men into our armies. Sir, there would be a shout of joy throughout the nation, in which our whole people would participate, if the intelligence should go out to them that we had a quarter of a million black men organized and armed to fight the battles of our country.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, although the whole question in regard to the advantages of the two different systems is not really involved in this discussion, yet it is so intimately connected with it, that I trust I may be pardoned for adding a word to this very extended debate.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs desires that authority should be given to the Government to extend the power of giving bounties over the period fixed by the proposed amendment of the Senator from Maine; and he thinks if that is suffered to stand, and the $300 commutation clause is permitted to stand in the enrollment bill, that will furnish a specific for all our evils. Sir, I would to heaven that it would, but I have no such feeling. I think we have tried this plan of volunteering long enough and effectually enough; and as disagreeable as the other mode may be, there are times in the history of legislators, as well as of all other men, when they are bound to march up to the solemn responsibility of public exigencies. We see and learn from the united voice of the Committee on Finance that it is not in the power of the Government to extend these facilities, even if the citizens of the country are ready to come forward, accept these bounties, and step into the ranks.

I do not know, sir, who is entitled to the credit of the idea, or who was its first discoverer, or how old or new it may be, that we now do not need money so much as we need men, bone and muscle. I am inclined to adopt that opinion, and although I know that it will involve immense sacrifices, although I know many men will be driven to the ranks who as yet have not gone there, still this is a cause worthy of the best blood of the country; and I believe that if the loyal portion of this nation had gone into the Army as the inhabitants of that portion of it in rebellion did, this huge conspiracy would have been crushed long ago.

Sir, I profess to no extraordinary feelings of patriotism, but I think each Senator and each citizen of this country should thank God that he lives in a day and in an hour filled as the present day and the present hour are with such vast and grand events, and that he has the opportunity of participating in transactions so great and ennobling. We may fly to this expedient, we may fly to that expedient; we may offer, as we have offered in some States, and as has been offered and paid in some portions of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, as high as $1,000 already, and yet we are deficient to a small degree in furnishing the quota that has been required of us. We here—I trust I say it respectfully—must take the initiative; we must march up to the position of demanding that the armies of the Republic shall be filled, and filled although it may be at the sacrifice of the best blood in the country. It seems to me that no evasion, no temporizing, no extending of the period, no shrinking, no squirming, will relieve us from the responsibility which we have to assume, and will be compelled to assume in a very short time, be it sooner or be it later. This huge insurrection, in my opinion, will never be quelled until the northern portion of this Union, with their bone and sinew, and not with their money, enter into the ranks and smell the smoke of battle.

Sir, I shall vote for the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Maine, as being upon a line with the idea I entertain, as to the duty we should pursue upon the present occasion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Sausbury, and Wright—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. I now offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further resolved, That the money paid by drafted persons under the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be drawn out on requisitions, as in the case of other public moneys. The money so paid shall be kept in the Treasury as a special deposit, applicable only to the expenses of draft and for the procurement of substitutes.

It was my purpose to move this amendment to the bill which was pending yesterday, but I fear from present appearances that we shall not be able to get that bill through before the holidays. This provision has the sanction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury. It only legalizes the arrangement made for taking care of the money received from the commutation.

Mr. COLLAMER. I propose to amend the amendment by adding, "for which the same is hereby appropriated." It is intended, of course, to have the money drawn out according to law, and our law is that no money shall be drawn out unless it is appropriated. I therefore wish to include the appropriation in the section.

Mr. WILSON. I accept that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The resolution was read the third time and passed. Its title was amended, by striking out the words "and premiums," so as to read: A joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing; and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounty to volunteers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 11) in relation to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THANKS TO CAPTAIN JOHN RODGERS.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it do pass. As I presume there will be no opposition to it, I ask that it be considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes (in pursuance of the recommendation of the President of the United States, and to enable him to advance Captain Rodgers one grade, in pursuance of the ninth section of the act of Congress of July 16, 1862) to tender the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers "for the eminent skill and gallantry exhibited by him in the engagement with the rebel armed iron-clad steamer Fingal, alias Atlanta, whilst in command of the United States iron-clad steamer Weebawken, which led to her capture on June 17, 1863; and also for the zeal, bravery, and general good conduct shown by this officer on many occasions."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday is Senate bill No. 7, relative to the bounties and pay of volunteers.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move to take up the resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to adjournment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to postpone the further consideration of the question before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 6.

to take up the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to an adjournment till the 5th of January.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the question is put on that, I should like to know if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is in the building to-day; and if he is, I should propose to proceed to the consideration of the other resolution on which the Senate was engaged yesterday morning. His colleague, I suppose, can say whether the Senator from Delaware, not now in his seat, is within reach, so that he can be had.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know the fact. I know that he was here this morning. I think it very likely that he is in some room in the building, but it can be ascertained in a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senate ought to proceed with the consideration of that resolution and have a vote on it before it concludes to adjourn over.

Mr. WILKINSON. The passage of this resolution will not affect that.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator says the passage of the resolution he proposes to call up will not affect the other resolution. Suppose we vote to adjourn over, then we may not be able to reach the other question. It seems to me that the Senate ought to finish the other question before it goes to play. I should rather interpose a motion, therefore, if the Senator from Minnesota makes no objection, to proceed with the consideration of the other resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Delaware is not present?

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to do it if the Senator from Delaware is not here.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to state that I saw the Senator from Delaware this morning, and he was complaining of being very unwell; and he desires time to prepare his argument in this case. He is not ready, and I can really see no impropriety in letting it go over till after the holidays. No injury can result to anybody. He will then be ready to make his argument.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that he will be ready to-morrow?

Mr. POWELL. No, sir. I did not say to-morrow, but after the holidays are over.

Mr. SUMNER. After the holidays! That is the point. The question ought to be settled before the holidays.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I do not suppose that a vote can be obtained upon the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts before the holidays.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not, pray?

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not think that on a question of that kind it is perfectly fair to press a man to a vote at once who is in the situation of the Senator from Delaware. I am as anxious to have that matter determined as the Senator from Massachusetts; but I must say that it looks a little harsh to force a Senator to appear here upon twenty-four hours' notice to argue a proposition that probably may involve his right to a seat; and I do not think it is unreasonable to give him a few days in order that he may be prepared to make his argument to the Senate, and therefore I shall be obliged to insist upon the calling up of the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is entirely mistaken when he supposes that the Senator from Delaware is asked to go on at twenty-four hours' notice. He has had nine months' notice, and the Senate understands all his objections. He himself has announced his objections, and I have no hesitation, speaking with all possible respect, in saying that they are of the most trivial character. I do not think them worthy of discussion in the Senate, especially after the consideration they have received. At the same time, if the request is made that this question shall go over until to-morrow and that we shall then proceed to a vote upon it, and especially if my friend from Minnesota makes that request, who knows my disposition to go with him always, I shall yield to what would seem to be the desire of the body, but I do think that there ought not to be delay in the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has been amended by the Senate. It originally applied only to the House. It will be read as amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Wednesday, the 23d instant, it shall be until the 5th day of January, 1864.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will suggest that that resolution had better lie on the table for the present. We cannot adjourn, or agree to anything of the sort, until we know the fate of the bill passed this morning, and which has gone back with amendments to the House. When that has been disposed of and provided for we can act upon this subject; but until then it will not be safe to do so. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 22, noes 14.

CARMACK AND RAMSEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives for reference.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) in relation to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey was read twice by its title.

Mr. COLLAMER. In order to understand to what committee that resolution should be referred, we desire to know the subject to which it relates. I therefore ask that the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, which directs that all the papers and evidence touching the claim of Carmack & Ramsey, submitted to the First Comptroller of the Treasury under the sixth section of the act of Congress approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857," together with all the questions relating thereto, shall be transferred to the Court of Claims for adjustment and determination, and the Comptroller is to cause the papers to be transferred to the Court of Claims accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To what committee shall the joint resolution be referred?

Mr. WADE. I suppose it ought to go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made if there be no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE ENROLLMENT LAW.

Mr. WILSON. The resolution that came from the House of Representatives this morning, and which has been amended and sent back to the House, disposes of three or four sections of the bill we had under consideration yesterday to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army; I therefore propose to lay that bill on the table and take up the bill to amend the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes. The committee propose some amendments to that bill, and I think we can make some progress in its consideration to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 18) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863. The bill authorizes the President of the United States, whenever he shall deem it necessary, to call upon the several States for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the public exigencies may require.

It proposes to amend the second section of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, by striking out all of the section after the word "enacted," and inserting the following, to wit: "That the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from the provisions of this act, and shall not be liable to military duty under the same, to wit: such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service; also, first, the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, and the Governors of the several States; second, the only son liable to military duty of a widow wholly dependent upon his labor for support; third, the only son of aged or infirm parent or parents wholly dependent upon his labor for support; fourth, where there are two or more sons of aged or infirm parents wholly dependent upon their labor for support, all of which sons shall have been drafted, the father, or, if he be dead, the mother may elect which son shall be exempt; fifth, the only brother of children not twelve years old, having neither father nor mother, wholly dependent upon his labor for support; sixth, the father of motherless children under twelve years of age wholly dependent upon his labor for support; seventh, where there are a father and sons in the same family and household, and two of them are in the military service of the United States, or have deceased or become permanently disabled in said service, as non-commissioned officers, musicians, or privates, the residue of such family and household, not exceeding two, shall be exempt; and no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt; provided, however, that no person who has been convicted of any felony shall be enrolled or permitted to serve in said forces."

It also proposes to repeal section three of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and so much of section ten of that act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class; and it is to be the duty of the board of enrollment of each district to consolidate the two classes mentioned in the third section of the act. If any State shall fail to furnish, within the time designated by the President, the number of men required therefrom, the provost marshal of the district within which any ward of a city, town, or township, or county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, which is deficient in its quota, is situated, is, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, to make a draft for the number deficient therefrom; but all volunteers who may enlist after the draft shall have been ordered, and before it shall be actually made, are to be deducted from the number ordered to be drafted in such ward, town, township, or county.

Any person enrolled who shall remove from any ward of a city, town, or township, or from a county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, may, on application to the proper board of enrollment, be enrolled in the place of residence to which he shall have removed, and may, upon proof of such enrollment, have his name stricken from the rolls of his former place of residence; and boards of enrollment are to have power to enroll any person whose name shall have been omitted by the proper enrolling officer. Any person enrolled under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish, at any time, an acceptable substitute, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted.

Provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof, acting by authority of the board, are to have power to summon witnesses and enforce their attendance by attachment in any case pending before them, or either of them, and the same witness fees and costs are to be allowed as may be allowed in the district courts of the United States, and they are to have power to administer oaths and affirmations; and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal, or board of enrollment, or member thereof, acting by authority of the board, or before any civil magistrate, to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal, or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than twelve months.

Copies of any record of a provost marshal or board of enrollment, or of any part thereof, certified by the provost marshal, or a majority of the board of enrollment, are to be deemed and taken as evidence in any civil or military court in like manner as the original record; but if any person shall knowingly certify any false copy or copies of such record, he is to be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury.

All claims to exemption are to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party claiming exemption, to the truth of the facts stated, and the testimony of any other party filed in support of a claim to exemption is also to be made upon oath or affirmation.

If any person drafted and liable to render military service shall procure a decision of the board of enrollment in his favor upon a claim to exemption, by any fraud practiced by himself, or by any other person with his knowledge or consent, or by any false statement or representation willfully made by himself, or by any other person with his knowledge and consent, or with the intent to evade military service by giving or agreeing to give to the provost marshal, or any member of the board of enrollment, or to any other person for their use or benefit, directly or indirectly, any bribe, pecuniary consideration, or other inducement, or by holding out or offering to them any gain or advantage of any kind, such decision or exemption is to be of no effect, and the person exempted, or in whose favor the decision may be made, is to be deemed a deserter, and may be arrested, tried by court-martial, and punished as such, and is to be held to service for the full term for which he was drafted, reckoning from the time of his arrest.

Any person who shall procure, or attempt to procure, a false report from the surgeon of the board of enrollment concerning the physical condition of any person drafted and liable to render service, or a decision in favor of such person by the board of enrollment upon a claim to exemption, by any such means, upon conviction in any district or circuit court of the United States, is to be punished by imprisonment for the period for which the party was drafted.

Any person who shall represent, directly or indirectly, to a drafted man that he has any understanding or secret influence with the provost marshal, or any member of the board of enrollment, or with any other person through whom he can procure, or aid in procuring, the exemption of such drafted man for physical disability, or the decision in his favor of any claim to exemption, or who shall promise to procure, or aid in procuring, such exemption or decision through any such understanding or influence, or by any similar means, or who shall receive any money or other consideration for procuring, or aiding to procure, or for promising to procure, or to aid in procuring, such exemption or decision through any such understanding or influence, or by any similar means, upon conviction in any district or circuit court of the United States, is to be punished by imprisonment for the period for which the person was drafted.

The fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed any papers in support of a claim for exemption from draft, or for any services that may be rendered to the claimant, are not, in any case, to exceed five dollars; and surgeons furnishing certificates of disability to any claimant for exemption from draft are not to be entitled to any fees or compensation therefor. Any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act, and any surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing certificates of disability, is to be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, for every such offense is to be fined not exceeding $300, or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding twelve months, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravation of the offense.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with several amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section one, lines four and five, after the word "call," to strike out the words, "upon the several States;" so that it will read:

That the President of the United States shall be authorized to call for such number of men, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line sixteen, after the word "support" to insert the words, "and actually supported by him;" so that the clause will read:

Second, the only son liable to military duty of a widow wholly dependent upon his labor for support, and actually supported by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line eighteen, after the word "support" to insert the words, "and actually supported by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line twenty, after the word "support" to insert the words, "and actually supported by them."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line twenty-two, after the word "dead" to insert the words, "or absent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line twenty-five, after the word "support" to insert the words, "and actually supported by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line twenty-eight, after the word "support" to insert the words, "and actually supported by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, lines thirty-five, thirty-six, and thirty-seven, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no person who has been convicted of any felony shall be enrolled or permitted to serve in said forces.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section five, line ten, after the word "officer" to insert the following words:

And any person arriving at the age of twenty years, and also any person who has not been in the military or naval service of the United States two years and honorably discharged therefrom; and said boards of enrollment shall release and discharge from draft any person who, between the enrollment and the draft, shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years, and shall strike the name of such person from the enrollment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section six, line two, after the word "enrolling" to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section seven, line four, after the word "attachment" to insert the words "without previous payment of fees."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section ten, line seven, after the word "knowledge" to strike out the word "and," and to insert the word "or;" so that it will read:

That if any person drafted and liable to render military service shall procure a decision of the board of enrollment in his favor upon a claim to exemption, by any fraud practiced by himself, or by any other person with his knowledge or consent, or by any false statement or representation willfully made by himself, or by any other person with his knowledge or consent, &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think that change ought to be made. In legal statutes the mere knowledge of the fact ought not to make the party liable to punishment. If he has knowledge of and consents and concurs in the act, it is sufficient to punish that, as it seems to me. To punish because of a mere knowledge of the act of another is going too far. I think the change ought not to be made.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was in section thirteen, line five, before the word "surgeons" to insert the words "physicians or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer what I send to the Chair as independent sections, to come in between the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee are first in order, as perfecting the sections, and then the Senator's amendment to strike them out or insert others will be in order.

Mr. GRIMES. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he did not expect to get through with the fourteenth section to-day. There is only one amendment of the committee yet remaining, and that is an independent section proposed to be incorporated in the bill as the fourteenth section. I propose to insert three or four sections in advance of that section. The Senator from Massachusetts does not care about entering on the discussion of the fourteenth section, which is to be a controverted point, at present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order of the business in the Senate is to dispose first of the committee's amendments. If there be no objection, however, the Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator to interpose his amendments before concluding action upon the amendments of the committee. The Chair hears no objection to that course. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, to insert the following as new sections:

And be it further enacted, That whenever a mariner or able seaman shall be drafted under the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," he shall have the right, within eight days of the notification of such draft, to enlist in the naval service as a seaman; and a certificate that he has so enlisted being made out in conformity with regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and duly presented to the provost marshal of the district in which such mariner or able seaman shall have been drafted, shall exempt him from such draft: Provided, That the period for which he shall have enlisted into the naval service shall not be less than the period for which he shall have been drafted into the military service: And provided further, That the said certificate shall declare that satisfactory proof has been made before the naval officers showing the same that the said person so enlisted in the Navy is a mariner by vocation, or an able seaman.

And be it further enacted, That whenever any such mariner or able seaman shall have been exempted from such draft into the military service by such enlistment into the naval service, under such due certificate thereof, then the district or locality from which such person has been drafted shall be credited with his services to all intents and purposes as if he had been duly mustered into the military service under such draft.

And be it further enacted, That any mariner or able seaman who is mustered into the military service, or who shall hereafter be mustered into the military service, may, on his application requesting to be transferred to the Navy, be so transferred under such regulations as the President shall establish: Provided, That such mariner or able seaman shall, at the time of such transfer, enlist into the naval service for not less than three years.

And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, yeoman, master-at-arms, or other person having an appointment or acting appointment authorized by law, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment, and forming one of a ship's complement.

And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the naval service of the United States that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be credited to the State, district, or locality in which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty under the act aforesaid, under such regulations as the Provost Marshal General of the United States may prescribe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. GRIMES. I simply desire to say that the amendment which I propose is, in substance, somewhat similar to a bill which I submitted to the Senate, and which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, excepting that this amendment does not propose, as that bill did, to grant bounties to persons who may be enlisted into the naval service. This proposition simply provides, in the first place, that whenever, under the operation of the enrollment and conscription law, any person who is an able-bodied seaman or mariner shall be drafted, that he may be and shall be transferred from the military service, where he could probably perform no very efficient duty to the Government, to the naval service of the United States. It then authorizes, in another section, the President of the United States, under such rules, and through the agency of such officers as he may determine, to cause persons who are found to be able-bodied seamen, and in the military service of the United States, to be transferred from that service, and connected with the naval service.

I will observe here, with regard to all these sections except the last, that I had a conference with the Provost Marshal General of the United States Army, and they met his approval. The last section which I have added, and about which he was not consulted, as it did not come particularly within the line of his duties, proposes to give to the States a credit for all mariners that may hereafter enlist into the Navy of the United States, upon the respective military quotas of those States. I have always believed it was proper that each of the States that furnish men to the naval service should be credited with them upon its military quota; and I have sought to discover some method by which this rule could be made retrospective, so that the State of Maine, for instance, or Massachusetts, if she has furnished a greater amount of seamen than some other States, should have that allowance made to her; but after examining the records of the Navy Department, and noticing the manner in which enlistments are made, I am satisfied it is utterly impossible for it to be done.

In order to inform myself on this subject I asked the chief ad interim of the Bureau of Recruiting to furnish me a statement of the number of enlistments into the Navy of the United States during the first eleven months of this year, commencing on the 1st of January, 1863, and ending on the 30th of November last. I find that during that time there were enlisted into the naval service nineteen thousand five hundred and thirty-seven persons. There is no record in the Department, nor at any of the naval rendezvous where these men are recruited, showing, or tending to show, of what States they are citizens. If there were, it would be a very easy matter to determine what States should be credited with the enlistments that have been made. But the records of the Department only show the nativity of these persons. The record shows that of these nineteen thousand five hundred and thirty-seven seamen, eight thousand one hundred and sixty-one—almost one half—are foreign born, and that sixty-one nations or independent provinces of nations furnish their contributions to make up the Navy of the United States. I find by reference to this table that there were enlisted, for instance, in the State of New York, nine thousand six hundred and ninety-four persons, of whom four thousand eight hundred and sixty were foreigners. Shall we assume that New York is entitled to be credited with those four thousand eight hundred and sixty foreigners? Have we any right to presume that they were naturalized, or were subject to be drafted in that particular place? If we did credit the city or the State of New York with those four thousand eight hundred and sixty persons, should we not be doing perhaps great injustice to other portions of the Union?

If you would not be justified in crediting that amount to the State of New York, with what reason could you credit to her the four thousand eight hundred and thirty-four persons who were born within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who were recruited in the State of New York? For instance, had I enlisted into the naval service of the United States in the city of New York six months ago, I should be found entered on this table as having been born in the State of New Hampshire. Now, would it be just that the State of New Hampshire should be credited with my enlistment? Should not the State of Iowa, of which I have been a citizen for the last twenty-seven years, be entitled to it?

Looking at the subject in this light, I drafted the proposition as it is now submitted to the Senate. I thought at first there might possibly be some way in order to ascertain the citizenship, or the residency, or the inhabitancy of the persons as were already in the naval service; but when I reflected upon it, I found that that would be utterly impossible. Some of our vessels are in the China seas; several of them are in the Pacific ocean. They are scattered all along on the Atlantic coast and in the Gulf of Mexico. It would be utterly impracticable for us to send a commission or to ascertain from these persons in any proper and authentic way where their citizenship or their residency was; and while we were attempting to ascertain that, all operations under our conscription or enrollment law must stand in abeyance.

Mr. WILSON. I think we ought to amend the last section of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. It seems to me that we can at any rate give credit for all persons who were enrolled under the act of the 3d of March last, and who have since gone into the naval service. I propose to amend it so that it will read:

That all enlistments into the naval service of the United States that have been or may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act entitled, &c.

That will go back, then, until the time of the enrollment. There are great many places where, during the last six or seven months, a large number of persons liable to do military duty have enlisted into the Navy, and enlisted, too, by large bounties. I think we can reach most of those cases, and I think we ought to do it. I therefore propose to amend the sixth section of the amendment as I have indicated.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator desires to defeat his bill, he had better insist on that amendment; for such would be the effect of it. I think I have attempted to investigate this subject as thoroughly as possible. How are you going to determine as to the enlistments that have already been made? If the Senator will look at the table that I have here, he will see that there have been, in the State of Missouri, over a thousand enlistments in the naval service. Not one of those men was born in the State of Missouri. If you refer to the table you will see that they were born in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and in foreign countries. What criterion will the Senator take for determining as to what State those persons shall be credited to? Will he take the places of their birth? That would be unjust to the State of Missouri. Will he go to each one of those persons and try to ascertain from him of what State he is a citizen? That is preposterous and absurd on the face of it. It cannot be done. It would take twelve months to do it, in the first place, even if you had the means, and could reach the men. You could not reach them in twelve months. You have got three or four ships in the East Indies. One State, for instance, the State of Maine, insists upon it that she has got one hundred and fifty citizens on one of the ships in the Pacific ocean, and she says that great injustice will be done to her unless she is allowed that credit, and here is a controversy immediately got up between the State of Maine and the authorities here, and the State of Massachusetts, which perhaps claims them as having been natives of that State, and in the mean time your conscription law remains to be enforced. The Senator from Massachusetts and the gentlemen from his section had better be content with furnishing the excess which they have furnished in consideration of the bounties which this Government has lavished upon that portion of the country in the shape of fishing bounties for the purpose of making these very seamen during the last sixty years of this Government. I am willing to give those States credit from this time forward for these enlistments; but let us not go back and attempt to accomplish that which it is utterly impossible, in the very nature of things, for us to accomplish.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, in line two of the last section of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, after the word "that" to insert the words "have been or;" so that it will read:

That all enlistments into the naval service that have been or may be hereafter made, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes nine, noes not counted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move an amendment in the shape of an additional section, to come in after the third section of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an additional amendment proposed by the committee, to come in as section fourteen, which will first be acted on.

Mr. WILSON. I would rather defer the fourteenth section for the present, until we perfect the bill, as that section may lead to some debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, further action on the fourteenth section of the bill will be postponed at the present time. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Massachusetts now proposes an amendment in the form of an additional section to the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the President shall call upon the several States for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the exigencies of the country may require, the quota of each ward of a city, town, or township, or of a county, where the county is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, shall be as nearly as possible in proportion to the number of men resident therein liable to render military service, taking into account, as far as practicable, the number which has been previously furnished therefrom.

Mr. WILSON. The committee unanimously agreed to this amendment on the bill we had under consideration yesterday, and I do not think there is anybody opposed to it. It simply proposes to equalize the burdens of the draft. There has been a great deal of complaint in the country on that point. There will be no difficulty in carrying it out practically, because the amendment merely provides that the thing shall be done as far as it is practicable to do it. Perhaps it cannot be fully carried out in all the States, though it can be in nearly all of them, because the records show what each town, ward, and section of a district has furnished. I think it will lead to no sort of difficulty at all. They are perfectly satisfied with it at the War Office. Great complaint has been made heretofore from all the States of the inequalities between the number required from different towns and sections.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to the amendment in its general purposes, but I wish to have the phraseology of the first part of it a little altered. It requires the President to make the call "upon the several States." I wish to insert the words, "for their respective quotas." I do not agree to this idea of calling on one State for its quota, and leaving another out. The effect of it is to give the people of one State great advantages in obtaining substitutes, and it produces an unfairness. I wish them to call on the several States for their respective quotas.

Mr. WILSON. We struck out the words "upon the several States" from the first section of the bill by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. This only refers to the calling out of the proportionate number.

Mr. WILSON. I am told it simply refers to the calling out of the proportionate number from each State. I suppose nobody will object to that.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is what I want. I desire them to call for the proportionate number from the States.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts reads, "that whenever the President shall call," &c. I believe there are certain calls now that have not been answered, in some of the States, and a certain number of men have been ordered to be drafted from those States. Would it not be well to make this provision applicable to the present draft? If we use the words, "under all calls of the President," that would include the present call. The phraseology may be altered in the first part of the section.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator thinks it does not cover the present call, he can, if he chooses, amend the amendment so as to include all drafts to be hereafter made.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well; I will do so.

Mr. WILSON. On a suggestion that has been made to me I will withdraw that amendment for the present. I shall offer it at some future time. I suppose we may now take up the fourteenth section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have an amendment to offer before you come to that section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment, and the question now is on agreeing to the amendment to add section fourteen to the bill, which will be read.

Mr. COLLAMER. Before proceeding to the fourteenth section, with the leave of gentlemen, I wish to call attention to the second section of the bill. One clause of that section is in these words:

"Seventh, where there are a father and sons in the same family and household, and two of them are in the military service of the United States, or have deceased or become permanently disabled in said service, as non-commissioned officers, musicians, or privates, the residue of such family and household, not exceeding two, shall be exempt."

What two? Here is the case of a father and son who have gone into the service. There are three more sons, and all of them may be drafted. The bill says, if there are two in the service, then the rest of the family, not exceeding two, shall be exempt. Now I want to know which two. How is that to be arranged? The two oldest, or the two first drafted? The clause is imperfect; it is incapable of execution as it stands, and it needs amendment. For the purpose of making it plainer, I will move to strike out the words "not exceeding two," so that where two of a family are in the service, or have been killed, the rest of the family shall be exempt from the draft.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment will be in order after the amendments of the committee have been gone through with, and then the bill will be open to further amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts desired to have the rest of the bill amended before we took up the fourteenth section.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator gave way to add a specific section.

Mr. COLLAMER. He then proceeded to put in an amendment of his own.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLLAMER. I withdraw it altogether.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President—

Mr. WILSON. I renew the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. I have no objection, however, to waiving it for the present.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. POWELL. If it is in order, I should like to offer an amendment to the bill as an independent section.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order first to dispose of the amendments of the committee. The committee propose to amend the bill by adding an additional section; which will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1853, as authorizes the discharge of any drafted person, upon payment of a sum not exceeding three hundred dollars, from further liability under that or any subsequent draft, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "that or," in the sixth line, so that it will read, "from further liability under any subsequent draft, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The section is still open to amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the other portions of the bill ought to be considered before we consider the last section proposed by the committee. With that view, I ask the consideration of the amendment which I proposed to the third section, as I wish to base upon that another amendment which I shall desire the Senate to consider before they consider the section proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs. I offered an amendment to the third section the other day, which I will ask to have reported to the Senate and considered at the present time.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana proposes to amend the third section of the bill, and asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me it is always more methodical and regular to consider the amendments of the committee first. The Senator can undoubtedly speak to his amendment, if he wishes to do so, on the committee's amendment, as it is connected with this subject-matter, but it seems to me we ought to dispose of this fourteenth section first, as it is the most important subject of controversy.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will explain to the Senator from Ohio why I prefer the course I have suggested. I think it is proper that we should have two classes: first, those who are not married, who should be called upon first; and secondly, all persons who are married and liable to military duty. Then, if that be agreed to, I have no objection, if it be insisted on by the Senate, that persons who are not married and who shall be drafted shall not be allowed to pay the $300. I think, however, that the Senate should stand by that proposition until the present draft is executed, and married men at least should be allowed to pay the commutation money. It is impossible to get at these points on the section proposed by the committee. I move, therefore, that the consideration of the section proposed by the committee be postponed until the amendment proposed to the other sections shall be considered. It seems to me that that would be the better course, and we should perfect the bill more satisfactorily.

Mr. WILSON. That can be done by unanimous consent. I do not know that there would be any objection to it. The proposition contained in the fourteenth section is a distinct proposition that stands out by itself; we all understand what it means. We may perfect the bill and then take that up afterwards. I certainly have no objection to the course proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection on the part of the Senate, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be entertained. The Chair hears none. It will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, in section three, line four, after the word "sixty-three" to strike out the following words:

And so much of section ten of said act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment of each district to consolidate the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the national forces of the United States not now in the military service, enrolled under this act, shall be divided into two classes; the first of which shall comprise all persons subject to do military duty between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, and who are unmarried; the second class shall comprise all other persons subject to do military duty; and the persons of the second class shall not, in any district, be called into the service of the United States until those of the first class shall have been called.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the classification which we find in the original law has not much reason perhaps for its support. I will read that section, and then the Senators can understand the proposed change. Section three of the law, as it stands, is as follows:

"That the national forces of the United States not now in the military service, enrolled under this act, shall be divided into two classes: the first of which shall comprise all persons subject to do military duty between the ages of twenty and thirty-five years, and all unmarried persons subject to do military duty above the age of thirty-five and under the age of forty-five; the second class shall comprise all other persons subject to do military duty, and they shall not, in any district, be called into the service of the United States until those of the first class shall have been called."

Which amounts to just this, that unmarried persons between twenty and forty-five, and married persons between twenty and thirty-five, constituted one class, and married persons between thirty-five and forty-five another class. Of course it very often occurred that it was quite as difficult for married persons between twenty and thirty-five to go to the service as for those between thirty-five and forty-five. The obligations to the family are the same; but with a family of small children it is frequently more difficult for the father to leave that family when he is between twenty and thirty-five than is the case with men between the ages of thirty-five and forty-five. In that class of cases children are frequently able to some extent to provide for themselves, but where the father is between twenty and thirty-five he frequently has to leave a family of very small children.

Now, I propose by the amendment that instead of that classification there shall be just the distinction between married and unmarried persons; that all unmarried persons shall constitute the first class, and that class shall be exhausted before married persons shall be called into the service at all; and then I care not whether the unmarried persons be allowed to pay the commutation money or not; whether they be the sons of poor men or rich men, if you please, let them go to the service; but for the married men, I hope the clause will be continued, allowing them to pay the commutation money. This distinction is a fair one, between married and unmarried persons.

As I had occasion to say during the discussion yesterday, a conscription law cannot be very popular. Perhaps what I said was not well understood, or was misconceived by the Senator from Massachusetts in his remarks this morning. He said that we ought not to have any reference to the question of popularity in our legislation. In respect to the effect of my vote upon myself, I do not propose to look to the question whether it be a popular measure or not; but in respect to the public mind, whether a law shall fall favorably upon that public mind or not, it is the duty of statesmen to consider that question. And when we are legislating upon so delicate a question as this, forcing men into the military service, to leave their families in many cases unprepared, we ought to have in our minds all the while, whether the measure is as acceptable to the public as it can be made; and it is our duty to the country, to the people, and to the Administration, to make this measure as palatable to the public as we can make it.

Now, sir, if we first require the unmarried men of the country to enter the military service, and will not call upon the married men until that class is exhausted, we shall have stripped this legislation of one very objectionable feature. It is a hard thing for a man to leave his family; and the Senate need not be surprised that in the country there is much prejudice excited in the public mind by legislation which forces a man to leave his wife and his children. It is a very powerful sentiment; and when a man is forced to leave the children whom he longs to provide for when he cannot well do it, we need not be surprised that that law is unpopular; but if we first require the unmarried men of the country to go into the service, and do not call upon the married men at all until that class is exhausted, we have certainly accommodated the law to a very great extent to the popular sentiment. I think that, in view of the efficiency of the law and the success of the Administration, we ought to do this.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I submit that if we adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, we ought to amend the title of the bill so that it will be, a bill to amend the enrollment act and also to encourage matrimony; for the effect of his amendment, if adopted, I think, would inevitably be to drive all unmarried men in the country into matrimony, and the first class would be absorbed in the second before the very first draft was commenced under the amended act. In the State of Wisconsin, the Legislature provided for paying a certain additional sum, I think five dollars a month, to the families of married persons who volunteered into the Army. The result has been that very many persons have volunteered on one day and got married on the next; and very many such marriages have taken place, I am told, between parties who were not entire strangers, but who never had certainly contemplated, either of them, matrimony the day before the enlistment.

I should seriously apprehend that if this amendment be adopted we should have all the magistrates and clergymen of the country applying for relief. They would want clerks to relieve them from the press of business on their hands, matrimony would be so popular and so frequent.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected—ayes ten, noes not counted.

Mr. DIXON. As the fourteenth section will probably cause considerable discussion, I ask leave to introduce at this time the amendment which I proposed the other day, and which has been printed.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

In section two, line thirty-four, after the word "two," insert:

Eighth, all persons recognized as clergymen or religious ministers by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion of which they are members.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I gave notice a few days since of my intention, with the leave of the Senate, to introduce a bill exempting ministers of religion, of all communions, from the operation of the enrollment act. The amendment which I have now offered furnishes me an earlier opportunity to test the opinion of the Senate on the subject.

The original bill, which is now proposed to be amended by the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, and which I propose still further to amend, was passed near the end of the last session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, when there was little time for deliberation and discussion. It was then proposed to exempt clergymen; but the question was but briefly discussed, and was not very deliberately considered. The public mind has since been called to it. So far as I can speak of public sentiment, it is strongly in favor of the exemption proposed. This is a consideration that, in a war like that now waged, which is eminently the people's war, is not without weight.

But again, in all wars, and in all countries, ministers of religion have been exempted from military service. No Christian country on the globe now demands such service from them. Never before, so far as I am informed, have the laws of any civilized or Christian country called into the field those consecrated to sacerdotal duties. What is there in the condition of this country, at this time, which should cause us now to adopt a different policy? Those who would be obtained as soldiers are few in number, and physically or numerically would scarcely be felt. To subject them to enforced military duty is therefore totally unnecessary, and seems an utter disregard of the expressed opinion of mankind and a violation of the sanctity of their religious duties. Even in the dire extremity of the rebel authorities, their clergy are exempted from conscription.

The clergy minister to the wants of the families of our brave soldiers during their absence, comforting them in their sorrows, and in death giving them Christian burial. They save the lives of thousands of our brave soldiers by bringing before their congregations the claims of the various noble charities devoted to their aid.

They are, with rare exceptions, loyal; and a loyal clergy at home is needed to counteract the baneful influence of a disloyal press. Many other reasons might be enumerated; but not now desiring to occupy the time of the Senate, I content myself with one final reason, which to my mind is superior to all others. It is this: the ministers of the Christian religion cannot, in my judgment, consistently with the duties of their sacred calling, engage in the bloody work of war. The Master whom they serve, and by whose authority they are consecrated to minister in holy things, has said that His kingdom is not of this world. The war now waged by this Government against the traitors who in armed force are leagued against its very existence, is in my opinion the holiest war in which any portion of mankind have ever been engaged. Yet I do not wish to see its battles fought by the ministers of religion. I shrink from the sight of men devoted to its high and holy duties acting in our armies as the executioners of traitors. They have a higher, a holier duty. Not for them to wield the sword of vengeance; not for them "the battle of the warrior, with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood."

The fact to which I have already alluded, that in every nation and among every people, Pagan, Jewish, and Christian, the ministers of religion have been exempted from every obligation which involved the shedding of human blood in hostile encounter, shows that this exemption rests on something so like an instinct that it springs to its conclusion without an argument; for I am not aware that the justice and propriety of the exemption have ever been made matters of formal disquisition. Yet precedents and authority are not wanting. I ask leave to read to the Senate an extract from Bingham's Christian Antiquities, volume one, page 374:

"SECTION I.—No Soldier to be ordained.

"A third inquiry was made into men's outward state and condition in the world. For there were some callings and states of life which debared men from the privilege of ordination, not because they were esteemed absolutely sinful vocations, but because the duties attending them were commonly incompatible and inconsistent with the offices of the clergy. Of this nature were all those callings which come under the general name of militia Romana, which we cannot so properly English the military life as the service of the empire. For it includes several offices, as well civil as military; the Romans, as Gothofred and other learned persons have observed, calling all inferior offices by the name of militia. So there were three sorts of it, militia palatina, militia castrensis or armata, and militia presidialis or cohortalis; the first including the officers of the emperor's palace; the second the armed soldiery of the camp; and the third the apparitors and officials of judges and governors of provinces; all of which were so tied to their service that they could not forsake their station. And for that reason the laws of the State forbade any of them to be entertained as ecclesiastics or ordained among the clergy. Honorius, the emperor, particularly made a law to this purpose: 'that none, who were originally tied to the military life, as some were even by birth, should, either before or after they were entered upon that life, take upon them any clerical office, or think to excuse themselves from their service, under the notion of becoming ecclesiastical persons.' The canons of the Church seem to have carried the matter a little further; for they forbade the ordination of any who had been soldiers after baptism, because they might perhaps have imbrued their hands in blood. This appears from the letters of Innocent I, who blames the Spanish churches for admitting such persons into orders, alleging the canons of the Church against it. The first council of Toledo forbids any such to be ordained deacons, though they had never been concerned in 'shedding of blood,' because, though they had not actually shed blood, yet by entering upon the military life they had obliged themselves, if occasion had so required, to have done it. Which seems to import that soldiers might be allowed in the inferior services, but were not to be admitted to the sacred and superior orders of the Church."

I will quote also from Waddington's History of the Church, page 166. To a petition that ecclesiastics should be exempted from military service the Emperor Charlemagne replied as follows:

"In our desire both to reform ourselves and to leave an example to our successors, we ordain that no ecclesiastic shall join the army, except two or three bishops chosen by the others, to give the benediction, preach, celebrate mass, take care of the sick, and give the unction of holy oil and the viaticum. But these shall carry no arms, neither shall they go to battle nor shed any blood, but shall be contented to carry relics and holy vessels, and to pray for the combatants. The other bishops who remain at their churches shall send their vassals well armed with us or at our disposal, and shall pray for us and our army. For the people and the kings who have permitted their priests to fight along with them have not gained the advantage in their wars, as we know from what has happened in Gaul, in Spain, and in Lombardy. In adopting the contrary practice we hope to obtain victory over the pagans, and finally everlasting life."

In the Christian church the principle finally resolved itself into the maxim, "Ecclesia abhorret a sanguine." Ecclesia here being equivalent to clerici—the ecclesiastical functionaries. To evade the force of this rule in a darkened age, when life was to be taken by an ecclesiastical sentence, there was a formal making over of the victim to the secular arm. This rule remains so absolute in England that the bishops withdraw when there is a question touching human life.

Perhaps these authorities and precedents may not tell with much effect on the advocates of the provision subjecting ministers of religion to enforced military service; but I am sure that the taste, judgment, and feeling of the people of this country revolt against it, and accord with the ancient and universal practice. Whether men be imbued with religious feeling themselves or not, it is shocking to them that the hands which distribute the commemorative and symbolic signs of man's redemption should be compelled to wield swords and muskets raised in deadly conflict.

In this age of the world the strength and power of a nation are not resolved merely into the physical and material elements of either. Among moral elements, religion has confessedly a place. Who will venture to assert that the influence of religion is not vitally connected with the character of the ministers of religion as a class? Any law which forces clergymen, not only into the actual commingling and participation with deeds of violence and bloodshed, but into associations with men who may need their instructions, yet without any facilities for doing among these men the only work they are fitted to do; nay, which deprives them by its provisions of the power of discharging the obligations by which they have bound themselves to God and man; any such law, I say, must operate to the serious detriment, if not the overthrow, of religion and the religious sentiment, as a great moral power in the nation.

I do not see any force in the argument that any exemption which would apply to the clergy may be equally claimed by any individuals or sect alleging conscientious scruples. A clergyman's profession is a fact—a fact with certain consequences, recognized by the common judgment of mankind. The other claim of exemption is grounded on an opinion, which not only may be wrong, but in the common judgment of mankind is wrong.

Should clergymen be exempted by the amendment which I have offered, it will be necessary to guard against one difficulty which may lead to an abuse of the exemption. The title minister of the gospel is in this country a very vague one. In the hope of escaping military service the vaguely applied appellation of "reverend" may be assumed. I suppose there is in every religious body some responsible authority. Some rule, therefore, ought to be specified by which the real status of any person claiming exemption as a clergyman might be ascertained and proved. I have therefore so drawn my amendment as to exempt only those recognized as religious ministers by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination of which they are members. I ask that the question on my amendment be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I shall certainly say but a very few words, and I should not speak at all if the yeas and nays had not been called.

In my State the clergymen are among the most patriotic class we have in the whole State, and I have heard no complaint against this provision of the conscription law. They preach for the Union, and pray for the Union, and I am perfectly willing that they shall fight for the Union. In order to maintain the power and efficiency of the clergy, they should bear the burdens of their flock; and any man who goes into the military service under this conscription law will have more power afterwards than he has ever had before to lead the people into the right way. The precedent drawn from the history of Charlemagne, tender-hearted and Christian as he was, shall not influence my vote. I am willing and anxious that every minister shall stand his chance to be conscripted, equally with his flock.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has stated a fact which is equally true in the State which I have the honor of representing in part. I have never heard a minister in my State complain of the law as it now stands. I have heard them in their ecclesiastical organizations thank God that their manhood had been recognized at least by Congress. I do not think the law, as it stands, is complained of anywhere by those who are officiating as clergymen; and I hope, therefore, the law may remain as it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his amendment, or that we shall postpone the vote on his proposition until after the question of the fourteenth section is disposed of. It may be right enough to make special provision for clergymen in case we refuse commutation to citizens generally. I say the question had better be taken after that. ["Oh, no!"]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Dixon, Doolittle, Hicks, Morrill, Saulsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Willey—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I send to the Chair an amendment that I intend to offer at the proper time. I ask that it be read, and if we do not act on the bill to-night I should like to have it printed. It is an important proposition, and I want Senators to consider it carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That any persons resident in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, or Arkansas, who may voluntarily enlist in the military service of the United States for the term of three years, shall be entitled to the benefits and privileges of this act; and such persons shall be mustered into the regiments or other organizations of whatsoever States they may elect; and the States into whose regiments or other organizations they may be mustered shall receive credit for such persons the same as though they were enlisted in such States: Provided, That persons of African descent shall be mustered only into regiments or other organizations composed or to be composed of such persons.

Mr. WILSON. I do not move that amendment now, but I merely give notice that I shall offer it hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts inform me whether persons in the several States designated have not now a right, without the passage of any law, to enlist in the service of the United States? I understand the amendment to be proposed upon the hypothesis that as the laws now stand, citizens of the several States named in the amendment, or, in other words, citizens of the seceded States, would not be received into the service of the United States. I do not understand that to be the law.

Mr. WILSON. In reply to the Senator, I will state that I understand the practice and law to be this: we are raising some twenty regiments, I think, in the State of Tennessee, for instance. Since General Burnside entered into East Tennessee, we have enlisted about thirty-five hundred men. So it is reported to me. We are enlisting men now in Arkansas; we are enlisting men in Louisiana; and General Banks, it is reported, has enlisted some in Texas. I suppose we can enlist all the black men and the white men in the region of country in rebellion, if we can get them into our ranks. The difficulty is to get them, to offer motives for them to go. It will require some expense to reach them, because in a great many of those States, where we hold military possession, and appear to cover a large section of the country, no man can go ten miles off the guarded lines without being shot down or exposing his life; running the risk of it, at any rate.

Now, what I wish to accomplish by this amendment is, to allow the States, the counties, the towns, or the officers of the States having regiments in the field, or individuals, to enlist any persons in the rebel States; to let the white men go into their regiments, and let the colored men be organized into companies and regiments. I think that if we allow it we can weaken the conscription there, and weaken the rebellion thus much, and we can raise many thousand men in the next three or four months. I see no reason in the world why we should not do it, why that country should not be open to us to enlist all the men we can; and as a motive to it, let the States in whose regiments the white men go, have the credit of them. We shall thus induce a great many men to offer bounties to these persons to go into the service—not bounties by the Federal Government, but bounties will be offered by individuals, by towns, by counties, by States. I think we ought to do it. I do not propose, however, to press it now. I only call attention to it now as an amendment intended to be offered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the House of Representatives has acted on our amendments to the joint resolution we had up this morning, adopting them all. We may therefore as well now take up the resolution in regard to a recess, and determine that question one way or the other. I move to lay aside the pending bill with a view to take up that resolution.

Mr. POWELL. Before that question is put, I desire to submit informally an amendment to the pending bill for the purpose of having it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. HOWE, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. HENDRICKS also submitted amendments, which were received informally, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the pending bill, and take up the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 35) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has been amended, and is now before the Senate for concurrence as amended.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that it be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Wednesday the 23d instant, it shall be until Tuesday the 5th day of January, 1864.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Salisbury, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Morrill, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

So the resolution was agreed to, as amended.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, the bill (H. R. No. 35) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, was taken up, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

GENERALS WITHOUT COMMANDS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate with the names of all of the major and brigadier generals who are without commands equal to a brigade, stating how long each has been without such command, and whether each has a staff; and if so, how numerous, and of what rank, and what amount of pay, including commutations and rations, each, including those of his staff, has been receiving while so without a command; and also that he inform the Senate how many major and brigadier generals are in command of departments, districts, and posts in the loyal States; and whether any necessity exists that requires that these departments, districts, and posts should be commanded by officers of such high rank, with their numerous and expensive staffs.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think the resolution ought to be addressed to the President, instead of the Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the resolution had better lie on the table for the present. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 22, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of committees for reports.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to make an explanation of my vote yesterday on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] to the joint resolution appropriating money for bounties to soldiers.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question; nor is it a question of privilege. It requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1865; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be made a special order for the 6th day of January next.

The motion was agreed to.

CARMACK AND RAMSEY.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the First Comptroller of the Treasury be requested to suspend further proceedings in reference to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey against the United States, referred to him by the sixth section of an act of Congress, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857," approved August 18, 1856, until further action of Congress touching the same.

Mr. COX. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I saw the Comptroller last evening.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. I want to make an explanation for his benefit. The First Comptroller has already suspended action on that case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I would rather have that done by the authority of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir, except for the purpose of saying a few words. It has been well understood that the First Comptroller of the Treasury was required by law to examine and settle this claim. It is desirable now that before he acts finally on it Congress should have an opportunity of expressing itself again with reference to the merits of the act of 1856. This resolution can do no possible injury, and will, at least, have the effect of justifying the First Comptroller of the Treasury in suspending further proceedings.

Mr. COX. The only reason of my remark was that I did not think the action of the Comptroller justified any reflection on his character.

Mr. HOLMAN. This resolution does not reflect upon him, nor has anything been said here or elsewhere reflecting on his conduct. This is merely to request him to suspend action on the claim until further action of Congress. Neither the integrity nor ability of the First Comptroller of the Treasury has been called in question.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire from the gentleman from Indiana, at whose suggestion it is that this matter is now proposed to be taken from the control of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, before whom it has been already argued on written agreement between the parties.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a joint resolution before the House, which has been referred to the Committee of Claims, on which I presume there will be a report referring the whole subject to the Court of Claims. It will be remembered that this whole question arises under the sixth section of the act of 1856, authorizing the First Comptroller of the Treasury to adjust the claim of Carmack & Ramsey against the Government for the transportation of mails on a certain mail route, on which no service was ever actually performed. The purpose of the joint resolution is to refer the whole subject from the First Comptroller of the Treasury to the Court of Claims, where it can be more properly investigated by a full court. It is for the purpose of suspending proceedings until that joint resolution can be acted on that this resolution has been reported.

Mr. DAWES. One word more. I did not hear the gentleman distinctly. I want to know whether I understand the case right or not. I wish to know whether it is a fact that this matter has been heard before the Comptroller, on a written agreement between the parties—the Government on one side and the claimants on the other—whether this resolution does not come in just as the Comptroller is about to make up his judgment, and whether it does not come from the same parties who agreed to submit it to the Comptroller, and who have been heard by counsel before the Comptroller. I only wish to ask the gentleman if I understand it right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do understand that this subject has been before the First Comptroller of the Treasury. I understand, too, that certain testimony has been taken before him. I do not understand, however, that the case has been finally heard, and that he is prepared to render his judgment. But I do understand, from the correspondence which has come before the House, that he regards the sixth section of the act of 1856 as settling the question that the contract under which these parties assert their claim was a valid contract against the Government, and that it is his duty under that section to determine simply the amount of damages which these parties should receive.

It will be recollected by my friend from Massachusetts that this subject has been before former Comptrollers of the Treasury. A report has been made, adverse to this claim entirely, since the passage of the act of 1856. And I am probably violating no confidence in saying, for I only know what is generally known by members of the House, that it is well understood that the Post Office Department, believing that these parties have no just claim whatever against the Government—and such has been the basis of the action of this House—has been disposed to favor, I will not say a suspension of the act of 1856, but a reference of the subject to a tribunal before which it can be more properly heard. The First Comptroller of the Treasury is not a very appropriate tribunal to try a great case against the Government, involving millions of dollars. The Court of Claims is certainly a more appropriate tribunal; and the purpose is to refer the whole subject to that tribunal.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to know from my friend whether the Post Office Department did not obtain from the Comptroller the basis on which this was to be settled before the case was submitted to him; and whether the Post Office Department did not after that agree with the claimants to submit this question to the Comptroller precisely as it had been to his predecessor. And I ask whether my friend is not aware of the fact that the Comptroller of the Treasury, just before his death, had this matter submitted to him by the Post Office Department with the consent of the claimants, and that he had prepared a report, but was stricken down the day before he had made it up and entered judgment in this matter? Does he not know that the matter came before Congress after that? Why, sir, it was heard here in this House; and subsequently to that the Post Office Department had these claimants enter into a written agreement, after learning from the Comptroller upon what basis he proposed to hear this case, to submit it to them. I want to know if my friend does not know, further, that, in a written stipulation filed by their attorney, both the Post Office Department and the claimants agreed that they had submitted all of the evidence and all of the arguments that they desired?

Now, I do not know what the judgment is to be. I do not care what it is to be. I only say that, after the Government has chosen its own tribunal and gone before it with these claimants, and because it suspects that the judgment is not going to be in its favor, or because it thinks that the decision will be unfavorable, it now proposes to transfer it to another tribunal more favorable to its interest. It is the last party in the world that ought to distrust its own tribunal, and come in here, after procuring adjournment after adjournment before the trial—to come in here as it is proposed, take it away from the Comptroller, and refer it to the Court of Claims. I do not want, for one, that the Government should be placed in that position.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I know this, so far as the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is concerned, that this subject was referred to the Comptroller of the Treasury. Mr. Medill, the then Comptroller of the Treasury, investigated the whole subject, and he made an able report to Congress. That report has probably been examined by every gentleman who hears my voice. It establishes the fact, beyond cavil, that not a single dollar was due from the Government of the United States to these claimants—not one single cent. There has never been any pretense that the Government realized any benefit from the contract, or that the contract was ever consummated. By this decision it is established that these parties have not the shadow of a claim against the Government of the United States.

This was the only adjudication on this subject by which the Government of the United States should be bound. It was the final determination of the whole question. After this, I admit that the question was brought again, as these questions are brought constantly, to the consideration of a succeeding Comptroller of the Treasury, the late Mr. Whittelsey, and it is said that he was prepared to make a report, which was prevented by his death. What the substance of that report was we are not informed, although some on the other side seem to have been. That is the report of the Comptroller to which my friend refers. That the Post Office Department consented to refer this matter to the Comptroller—if such is the fact, and I have no information on that subject—does not, in the most equitable view of the case, preclude the further action of Congress.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. In one moment. Whether it has been referred by the present Postmaster General to this tribunal or not cannot be a question of consequence. The question is now, the subject having been acted on by one Comptroller and ably reported against, whether this claim should be passed on again, or whether it should be referred, in justice to all of the parties concerned, to a tribunal sufficiently numerous in its elements of judicial qualities as the Court of Claims? It is a mere question of policy. In allowing this question to come before one of the officers of the Government, I think that the Government of the United States has shown extraordinary favor to these claimants. They ought to see, when there has been one adjudication on this subject by one officer, to whom it was referred by law, that that should be final and conclusive. This proposition is to suspend this proceeding until Congress shall act on the resolution to refer the whole subject to the Court of Claims, whose decision must necessarily be final. I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] as I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, when I offered the other day the resolution on this subject—

Mr. SPALDING. I object to yielding the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman from Indiana will yield to me, I will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is well known that if objection be made to my yielding the floor, and I yield it without moving the previous question, I lose the right to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I will renew the demand for the previous question if the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield the floor to the gentleman with that understanding.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know anything about the special merits of this controversy between the Post Office Department and these contractors, but I do know something about the character of the First Comptroller, and I know that he is as well qualified to decide this question as any member of the Court of Claims, either as to professional capacity or as to integrity; and if the question is now taken out of his hands it will be a personal imputation upon that officer which I think this House, if they knew him, would be reluctant to cast. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the gentleman, before he moves the previous question, how many million dollars this claim is supposed to involve?

Mr. MORRILL. It involves, at the utmost, $113,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand it amounts to about two millions.

Mr. KASSON. I can state to the gentleman that it involves $1,800,000.

Mr. DAWES. I think I am authorized to say that no such claim has ever been made.

Mr. KASSON. I have seen it.

Mr. MORRILL. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I say that the claim, at the utmost, involves only $113,000. I now renew the demand for the previous question, and move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope I shall be allowed to ask one question by common consent. I would like to know how long this claim has been pending?

Mr. STEVENS. Since I was a boy. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's motion; and the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The House then divided on seconding the previous question, and there were—ayes 32, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. HOLMAN and SLOAN were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denning, Denison, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Carson, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kernan, King, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Lovejoy, McAllister, McClure, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moothead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Per-ham, Pike, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Sutes, Strouse, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu R. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Brundage, Cole, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, Garfield, Gooch, John H. Hubbard, Knapp, McKinney, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Noble, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, William B. Washburn, and Williams—25.

So the resolution was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ALLISON stated that Mr. WILSON was detained at his room by indisposition.

Mr. HOLMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRINGTON, was detained at his room by sickness.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, joint resolution No. 11, in relation to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey, and moved the previous question on its engrossment and third reading.

The joint resolution directs that all the papers and evidence touching the claim of Carmack & Ramsey, submitted to the First Comptroller of the Treasury under the sixth section of the act of Congress, approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the year ending June 30, 1857," together with all the questions relating thereto, shall be transferred to the Court of Claims for adjustment and determination.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation, the joint resolution was engrossed and read the third time.

The question was taken on the passage of the joint resolution, and it was passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATE GOVERNMENT FOR COLORADO.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on Territories, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 11) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

STATE GOVERNMENT FOR NEBRASKA.

Mr. ASHLEY also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 14) to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. WHALEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be authorized to employ a clerk, at the usual compensation of four dollars per day for the time he shall be actually employed as such clerk.

Mr. WHALEY. I desire to state that the resolution offered the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Washburne] did not include the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That committee was allowed a clerk at last Congress, and I do not think that any member of it is willing to perform the duties of clerk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state that when I introduced a resolution authorizing clerks to committees, I omitted inadvertently the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That committee had a clerk at last Congress; and certainly I think it requires a clerk more than any other committee of the House, on account of the amount of business which comes before it. I trust the resolution will pass.

The question was put; and the resolution was adopted.

NATIONAL CANAL CONVENTION.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Joint Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House ten thousand copies of the memorial of the National Canal Convention communicated to this House by the President.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw the motion to lay on the table. It is not a very large number to have printed.

The motion was not withdrawn.

Mr. STILES called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I suggest—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I ask unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Broomall, James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Donnelly, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kelley, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Scofield, Smith, Spaulding, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thomas, Tracy, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Wilder—52.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eden, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Kerian, Loan, Lovejoy, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Orth, Perham, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Ellihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Windom, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—74.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. BROOMALL stated that his colleague, Mr. THAYER, was unavoidably absent.

The question recurred on the resolution.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I believe that some members of the House understand the resolution as covering the whole report of the proceedings of the canal convention at Chicago. It is not so. It is merely to print the memorial sent to the President, which covers only ten or twelve pages.

The question was taken; and the resolution was adopted.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK submitted the following resolution; which, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be authorized and directed to print for the use of the Washington aqueduct department five hundred copies of the annual report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think that that resolution should be adopted. It sets a bad precedent.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

BUREAU OF EMANCIPATION.

Mr. ELIOT, from the select committee on emancipation, reported a bill to establish a Bureau of Emancipation; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and re-committed to the same committee.

MISSOURI HOME GUARDS.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the bill appropriating money to pay the home guards of Missouri, which was made the special order for this morning.

The SPEAKER. It was made the special order for yesterday, and not from day to day until disposed of. It seemed to be understood by the remarks that were made that the bill should be made the special order for to-day, and if there be no objection it will be so considered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOW. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LOVEJOY in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be House bill No. 35, to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. McClurg,] who has been closely identified with the home guards of Missouri, in order that he may explain this bill.

Mr. McCLURG. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the committee but for a few moments. Nothing but the importance of the immediate passage and approval of this bill induces me to make the few remarks I shall now attempt. For, sir, I can assure this House I fully appreciate and realize the delicate situation of a new member, who is in danger, on the one hand, of sacrificing the interests of his constituents to too great a deference to the rules of courtesy which should properly be extended to more experienced members, and, on the other hand, of manifesting, from an excess of zeal, an improper forwardness tending to impair the means of usefulness incident to his position. I shall not, therefore, attempt a lengthy speech. Neither is it necessary. I shall confine myself to what I conceive to be strictly and legitimately my duty, and make a few points bearing directly upon the bill before the House. I have been requested to do so by a portion of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom the bill was referred, for a more satisfactory understanding of the questions involved by those who have not been informed, as I am probably better acquainted with the facts than any member present. I shall not attempt embellishments, as every member can add them at his leisure.

It will be seen that this bill is to provide for a "deficiency" in a certain appropriation. It bears on its face, therefore, evidence that a former Congress made an appropriation for the same object. This is an argument in favor of the justness of the bill. It is "to pay officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri." The history of the case, in few words, is this: when slavery attacked our Government, and our noble President, who has inscribed his name upon the roll of the immortal great, called for volunteers to drive back the threatening invaders, the State of Missouri had at the head of the executive department a disloyal Governor, Claiborne F. Jackson, who refused to furnish even one man for that "diabolical" purpose. The attempt was made by this Governor and a disloyal Legislature to carry Missouri out of the Union under the operations of a military bill requiring all to swear to obey all orders of officers placed over them by a traitorous Governor. It became necessary for loyal men to prepare for self-defense and the defense of the Government. The rush to arms was sudden. Organizations were hastily made by those unaccustomed to military affairs. They were without due form—not in accordance with the written law. Where the population was nearly equally divided, the first organized companies would maintain the rule. The urgency required prompt action.

At this critical period in the history of Missouri we had in command a Nathaniel Lyon. The loyal heart of Missouri's sons found a sympathetic chord in his breast, which was but too soon and too boldly bared to the traitorous foe. He realized his situation. He was surrounded by an active, numerous, designing enemy, attempting to mature plans for the overthrow of both the State and General Governments. He had but a force at his command of a few hundred regulars. He responded favorably to the inquiries of the loyal men, and encouraged organizations of what were called home guards. He gave commissions; he promised arms and distributed them so far as was in his power, and pledged, so far as he could, the Government for the pay for services. It was a contest between loyalty and disloyalty in Missouri, and a Lyon thought it better to set aside, for a moment, the forms of law than the Government itself. Informal organizations were made, and history tells the result. Those home guard organizations, under the leadership of General Lyon, shaped and preserved the loyal sentiment of Missouri, and maintained her in her true position, which she now occupies in the Union. The home guards of St. Louis, and to the credit of the Germans be it said, enabled General Lyon to capture the encampment known as Camp Jackson, which will go down to all coming generations as one of traitors. That capture saved St. Louis, the St. Louis arsenal and arms, and opened the way to the overthrow of the traitorous State government, and proved to be the salvation of the State. Other incidents and fields are not wanting that testify to the valor of those home guard forces. Jefferson City, Boonville, Lexington, Carthage, and the bloody field of Wilson's Creek, where the immortal Lyon fell, all give evidence of their bravery. At Wilson's Creek they fought side by side with the regularly drilled troops in the hottest of the fight. They are those who first bore the hardships and privations incident to the troubles in Missouri, in the work of hunting rebel bands, when not too numerous, in the country, and betaking themselves to the brush when pursued by overpowering numbers, and in capturing the powder and lead which had been distributed by Governor Jackson throughout the State for concealment and use by disloyal agents. This was when these organizations were being made. When organized into companies, or battalions, or regiments, the service, so far as I know, was performed in such manner as required of similar organizations regularly in the service. And for this service only, after organization, have claims been allowed, which it is proposed to pay from this appropriation. Valuable services were rendered, which would have required the same number of regular volunteers to have performed. Their services were accepted, not only by General Lyon, but by General Frémont. Many were armed and equipped under orders from General Frémont, and treated as though the Government valued their loyalty and services. As for the seventeen companies over which I was honored with the command as colonel by General Frémont, he ordered their rolls to be recognized, and the paymaster to pay. His order was not respected. After his removal, as they were not recognized as regularly in the service, and therefore not to be paid, it became necessary to disband. The result was, men in destitute circumstances were returned to destitute families, whose homes, in very many instances, had been robbed of the very necessities of life, having served, some one, some two, others three or six months, without pay. To many it appeared to be wrong treatment, and would have driven men less loyal into the ranks of the enemy. But I must say I have known but two or three to have gone over to the traitors. They had confidence in the ultimate just action of a Government that needs not the services of her people without reward, and their respect was such for the old flag that had ever protected them that their eyes were not bedimmed when beholding it, although filled with tears at the sad picture before them of children suffering for the necessities of life. They indulged the hope that the promises of a Lyon and a Frémont would be verified by the action of a just Government, to protect which at least one half of those home guards went into the regular volunteer service, and from among them many heads of distressed families have been offered as sacrifices to freedom on the battle-fields of Corinth, Iuka, and Vicksburg.

The justness of the claims of these men was recognized by the Thirty-Seventh Congress. An act "to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pension," was approved March 25, 1862; and the Secretary of War was authorized and required to pay officers and men who had been actually employed in the military service of the United States, whether mustered into actual service or not, where their services had been accepted and actually employed by the generals who had been in command of the department of the West, or the department of Missouri, as in cases of regular enlistments. On the 14th day of May, 1862, $100,000 were appropriated for such purpose. Difficulties at once presenting themselves to the Secretary of War in deciding on the numerous informal claims that were presented, caused the passage and approval of a joint resolution on July 12, 1862, suspending the payment, and requiring the appointment of three commissioners to examine all claims arising under the provisions of the act of 25th March, 1862, and report the same to the Secretary of War. As the advice and consent of the Senate were necessary in the appointment of the commissioners, there was a failure to appoint from an oversight of the law, and the time in which they could act expired before the last session of Congress. Therefore that joint resolution of 12th July, 1862, was revived by a joint resolution approved February 16, 1863, and in accordance therewith three commissioners—Hon. Hawkins Taylor of Iowa, Hon. Charles T. Sherman of Ohio, and Colonel Francis Russell of Missouri—were appointed. They have faithfully and ably, and no man will read their report without saying honestly, discharged the duties that devolved upon them. That report is a tribute of respect that reflects luster upon the character of those loyal men known as "home guards," and credit upon the candor and patriotism of those who bestowed it. It is more valuable from the fact that two of the commissioners reside in other States than Missouri, and could not be suspected of the operation of undue influences. Indeed, a perusal of their report will convince you that they have made themselves liable to the remark "that they discriminated rather nicely in favor of the Government;" for they have taken no latitude, but allowed only for services of persons, and not of horses, although services were proved to have been performed, in most cases, by mounted men. But they inform us in their report that they have only allowed for services of horses in a few cases where the companies were actually organized and accepted as cavalry, refusing in other cases on the ground that the horses were foraged by the Government, when otherwise they would have been left exposed to the enemy, and have fallen into their hands. The Government cannot complain.

They furthermore inform us that "no claim was allowed unless it was strictly for personal service in military service," and that "from proof other than the claimants';" "all were not only required to show that they were called out or accepted by proper authority, but performed actual military service in the field, as distinguished from services in organizing, drilling, recruiting, or in camp;" and that claims "only were allowed where their existing organizations had been regularly called out and actually served in the field under proper authority, and in regular military capacity or service."

Surely no argument or language is necessary to show that such claims should be paid. It is a self-evident proposition. Indeed, by the law now existing that is acknowledged, and payment is required to be made, as recommended by said commissioners, and as required by act of 25th of March, 1862. All that is now wanting is an appropriation of the money for which this bill provides. The claims allowed, as you will see in the report of the commissioners, as well as in the report of the Secretary of War, amount to $800,612 13. As I have before stated, $100,000 were appropriated 14th May, 1862. The deficiency is, therefore, the amount asked for and set forth in this bill, $700,612 13. The reasons for urging the passage of this bill now without delay are these. As I have stated, many of the families of the claimants are very destitute. They live in a country, many of them, that has been overrun by the rebel army and made desolate. Many of them were in active service, in companies of the enrolled militia of Missouri, last spring, at the very time they should have planted corn to bread their children, and were prevented from so doing. By the organization of provisional regiments in the summer and fall, seven eighths of these men were furloughed home. They have lost the crops of the spring, and are without even the dependence of a soldier's pay, in State bonds, at twenty per cent. discount. And, again, some unprincipled claim agents, who would enrich themselves from the poverty of others, and fill their cup of pleasure from the tears of starving children, are now endeavoring to take advantage of the credulity and necessity of these unfortunate men, and, by inducing them to believe that, according to the tardy course of legislation, a bill for the appropriation will not be passed before midsummer, and that they cannot receive their pay for twelve months, buy their claims at thirty to fifty per cent. discount. Our prompt action will stop this genteel swindling. The appropriation being made, our efficient Secretary of War will provide, without unnecessary delay, for the payment of the claims. Two years have expired since the last of the service was rendered. These true men need our help, and the Government owes it. I hope, therefore, there will be no opposition.

It is my request that, as Hon. HENRY T. BLOW, of Missouri, is upon the Committee of Ways and Means, and was one among others specially appointed to investigate the facts connected with this bill, he will make such remarks as he may feel the occasion requires.

Mr. COX. I offer the following proviso, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, however, That in the payment of the money hereby appropriated, such payments shall be made directly to the officers or soldiers by whom the services were rendered, or to their personal representatives, or to their agents appointed by powers of attorney; and no assignment of any sum due to any officer or soldier shall be valid.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have any serious objection to the amendment that has been proposed by the gentleman from Ohio. Still I do not think that it is necessary. I know something of these early troubles in the West, having been closely connected with the management of the seventeen hundred men under the command of Colonel McClurg. I served under Colonel McClurg as major. I do not think that you will find any man from the State of Missouri, any man from Missouri who is an attorney-at-law or a professional man, who will ask that this money shall be paid to any other person than the person who directly should have the benefit of it. I ask the gentleman from Ohio, in all the kindness of my heart, that he will, for the benefit of the men who served with me, and the men who fought as home guards the dreadful battle at Wilson's Creek, withdraw his amendment, and let the bill go through as it has been presented to the consideration of the House. These home guards were rejected by General Harney, but they were instituted and recognized by Generals Lyon, Frémont, and Curtis, and of all the commanders of that department. They were driven from their homes, and they have fought the battles of the country without having received a dollar from the Government of the United States for their services. In Kentucky you will find the same men as the home guards of Missouri. You will find the same men in Maryland and Kentucky and Missouri. I ask, therefore, that the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COX. I understood, when he first rose, that the heroic and gallant gentleman from Missouri had no objection to my amendment. Now he wishes me to withdraw it. I understood that his colleague had no objection to it. I do not think that it will embarrass, but rather will facilitate the passage of the bill. It is a proper amendment to provide for claims of this nature.

Mr. BOYD. Let it pass.

Mr. COX. I am more of the opinion that it ought to pass since I heard the gentleman's remarks. He says that if this bill is not passed at once these sharpers will cut under the soldiers—that they will be cut out of their pay by a sort of genteel swindling. Many of these claims have been lying for a year and more, and, non constat, some of these swindlers have been at them. My proposition is in good faith to protect these brave and gallant soldiers. I was touched; my sensibilities were aroused, by his appeal, and I want to have this matter well considered. I want to see this money, when appropriated, go to the proper parties, and for that purpose I have submitted my amendment.

One word more about the bill itself. I think that it would have been better to have had the report read before any discussion took place. I have examined into it. I confess I was surprised when I saw the amount of $800,000 passed upon by these commissioners. I have no doubt they were fair men. But it was astonishing to members of this House who remembered what the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] said on the subject, and what we understood was the fact from the Secretary of War, that instead of $800,000, these claims would not amount to more than $100,000. If, as my gallant friend says, these soldiers did not expect anything for their defense of the State, why did not the Secretary of War adjudicate these claims in his own Department? I am told that he is opposed to their payment.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Chairman, it seems hardly understood yet that in the serious difficulties that we had in Missouri at the outbreak of the rebellion forty thousand men sprang to arms. Had it not been for those forty thousand men, Missouri would have been a rebel State. Twenty-seven thousand men, as is shown by this report of the commissioners, were organized, and twenty-four thousand and upwards have been found worthy of pay after the strictest scrutiny on the part of the commissioners. It was a big thing. It saved Missouri. They were the men who intervened between the rebels in Missouri and the freemen of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio; and if they had not thus sprung to arms the battles fought at Springfield and Carthage and Boonville would have been fought upon the free soil of Illinois, and that with rebels from the State of Missouri.

I know, sir, that these facts were never known, and were never presented to Congress, as they ought to have been, and these twenty-seven thousand men have gone unpaid for that reason, and their families are suffering; and if it had not been, as I said yesterday, that an all-kind Providence smiled upon them, and for the action of our county court, which appropriated several hundred thousand dollars to sustain them, there would have been no end to the sufferings they would have endured.

Gentlemen have only to refer to the report of the commissioners to see the magnitude of this organization, and that, instead of $100,000, it would have more nearly required $2,000,000 to pay them justly; for, in addition to the twenty-seven thousand men that claimed something from your Government, there were thirteen or fourteen thousand men who have never made a claim for a single dollar up to this hour.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection that there should be a rigid scrutiny into the claims made on behalf of these soldiers of Missouri. When we see millions called for here every day, I look upon it as the bounden duty of this House to scrutinize every claim that may be presented; and if these claims now before the committee will not stand the closest scrutiny, then I am prepared to say there are very few demands here for appropriations that will.

Two years ago Congress thought proper to pass a law, and the working of that law shows that no wrong can be perpetrated against the Government if it is perfectly carried out. Before reading the law, however, I will say that with very little military experience in the great mass of the people, there was a great demand for men in Missouri. General Frémont sent his recruiting officers all over the State to raise what was called, or what they chose to term themselves, the home guards. Colonel White, of St. Louis, was authorized by General Frémont to raise a regiment. Colonel White came up into my section of the State. He came into my county, and into the adjoining counties. I went with him to aid him in the matter. I went among the people with him. I heard his promises and statements, and he was successful in that and the adjoining counties in putting a regiment into the field when it was absolutely needed. Colonel White claimed to have authority to muster the men in and to make out the proper mustering-in rolls. I did not know but what he had such authority; nor did anybody else. And so it was all over the State. Men were irregularly brought into the service, yet they did perform signal services in the State.

Sir, there was scarcely a soldier within the walls of Lexington, at the time it was besieged and captured by Price, except these home guards, with the exception of the commands of Colonel Mulligan and of Colonel Marshall, of Illinois. Besides those troops, there were none but home guards there. Some of them were killed, and others wounded. Colonel White himself was wounded, and, if not already dead, now languishes upon the bed of death. Colonel Grover, who was lieutenant colonel of the regiment raised in my county and the surrounding counties, was also wounded, and has long since died from his wounds. A dozen or more of the men living immediately around me were killed at the siege of Lexington, and their wives and orphans are not the persons who have sold their claims. I know not a single one who has sold the claim. It is the wives and orphans of those men who are now asking this pittance at the hands of the Government, and it will be a very small pittance to each. I remember, from investigating the claims of those who had been recruits in my neighborhood, that none of them exceeded between fifty and sixty dollars. And why? Because the men were recruited and put into the service irregularly, in the month of June and in the month of September, Price captured all of them from that part of the State, because they were inside the fortifications of Lexington; and after they were captured, they were, of course, dismissed from the service.

The law authorizes and requires the Secretary of War to allow pay to the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates who have been heretofore actually employed in the military service of the United States, whether mustered into actual service or not, where their services were accepted. If they were irregularly mustered into service, that would not give them any claim for pay under this law; but if, with the irregular mustering in, the commander of the department of Missouri accepted their services, and if they actually did serve under his command, then they were to be paid. There is no chance of any one being paid under this law who does not show, by proper muster-roll and proper certificate, that he had been not only mustered in, irregularly though it might be, but that he had actually performed military service.

As to the amount of the claims, I do not know how they came to accumulate to so much; but I am fully satisfied, from the general rush that was made by men to serve their country at the time the call was made, that the whole State was alive with troops. Whether men were mustered into service regularly or irregularly was a matter which very few knew anything about. The Secretary of War found it difficult, under these circumstances, to ascertain who were entitled to pay. Finally Congress passed a joint resolution suspending the action of the Secretary of War, and authorizing the President to appoint commissioners to examine and settle the claims of officers and men. For some cause, I know not what, the time was limited to six months. The commission was not organized within that time. The time lapsed. It then became necessary to pass a second resolution. That was passed at last session of Congress. It directs that after the commission shall have examined into the question submitted to them, it shall report within sixty days on all such claims as may be presented by persons claiming to have been organized or to have performed services according to the provisions of the act, whereupon (here is the language of the resolution) "payment shall be made as recommended by the said commissioners, and as required by said act."

Now, will this House refuse to make an appropriation under those circumstances? I have really heard no gentleman say that he is opposed to paying these men. But it is objected that the amount is too large. I cannot say anything about that. The commissioners appointed by the President have examined the matter. The opinion in Missouri is that they did not allow very many claims which were just and proper, and which should have been allowed. But we make no complaint about that. I will vote for that part of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio which directs that the money shall not be paid to anybody except the soldier himself or his wife or children. I want that in the bill, and care not how many sharpers it may injure. But there is another part of that amendment to which I do object on account of the hardship it would work. It provides that the money shall not be paid upon any power of attorney from the party unless it be signed after the passage of this act. I can cite a dozen of cases in my own county where the men entitled to pay under this act are now serving in distant parts of the country, having left powers of attorney for the collection of their claims for the benefit of their wives and families. If the amendment prevails, it will produce much trouble in all such cases. I hope, therefore, that that part of it will be stricken out, and that the joint resolution will be passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, (the Speaker having resumed the chair,) and a message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notified the House that the Senate had concurred in the joint resolution giving the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers.

MISSOURI HOME GUARDS—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COX. If that part of my amendment which the gentleman objects to be stricken out, the Secretary of War will pay to all who present powers of attorney, no matter whether signed before or after the passage of this act. It will enable every one of these sharpers to purchase up these claims, and to come in and get the money.

Mr. KING. I think that it is right, and I will vote for it. There is an amendment which I wish that the gentleman would adopt. It ought to provide that where the money is drawn by power of attorney the person holding the power of attorney shall make an affidavit, and file it, together with the power of attorney, with the paymaster, that he does not draw it for any other than the soldier or his widow or children who are entitled to it.

Mr. COX. I hope that my distinguished friend will put that in writing, and move it as an amendment to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman accept it as a modification of his amendment?

Mr. COX. I will wait until I see it in writing. My only object, Mr. Chairman, is to secure those officers and soldiers who have served, and their families, the use of this money. I am informed by the gentleman from Missouri, since this debate opened, that a large amount of these claims has been purchased by persons in St. Louis and elsewhere, and that consequently there will be no benefit to the soldiers.

Mr. ODELL. The statement made by the gentleman from Ohio is an important one, and one that we ought thoroughly to understand. Now, is it so, that these claims amounting to $800,000 are in the hands of claims agents? I hope that we will have an answer to the question.

Mr. BLOW. I understand that the amendment of my colleague is accepted by the gentleman from Ohio, as a modification of his own. I also understand that the amendment as modified has been accepted. If that be so, I move then that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. COX. I have not yielded the floor to be out off in that way. I only yielded the floor for the purpose of hearing an answer to the question of the gentleman from New York. I want to know, with him, whether we are appropriating this money for the soldiers or for speculators.

Mr. ODELL. I ask the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. McClurg,] who addressed us at length on this subject this morning, whether it is true, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, that this appropriation is to pay the claims agents who have purchased these claims from the soldiers, or their widows and children? It is proper that we should understand whether this money, which we are going to vote, is to go into the hands of those who have bought these claims at fifty or seventy-five per cent. discount, or into the hands of the soldiers to whom it is due. It is necessary that the question should be answered, and that the House should know.

Mr. McCLURG. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. McCLURG. Mr. Chairman, I will cheerfully answer the question of the gentleman from New York as far as I am able. I cannot give a definite answer so far as figures are concerned. I know that claims agents have been traveling through Missouri—that is, as far as it is safe for them to travel—trying to make the impression upon the minds of the soldiers who served as home guards that it would be a long time before an appropriation would be made to pay them for that service; trying to discourage them, and then to purchase their claims at a heavy discount. I have known claims worth forty or fifty dollars to have been sold for five or ten dollars. I can name an important firm of claims agents in St. Louis who have been engaged in the purchase of these claims.

I am willing to assume the responsibility, as the question has come up, of naming them. I refer to the firm of Mason & Clements. They are engaged in sending claims agents throughout the State for that purpose. In the early part of this month an editorial appeared in the St. Louis Republican, induced, I have no doubt, by statements made by that firm, that it would be twelve months before these claims would be paid. At the same time they were engaged in buying up those claims. I cannot say what amount is in the hands of claims agents—probably not more than one quarter. It may amount to one half. I have no data to govern me.

Mr. BOYD. I represent twenty-seven counties of the State of Missouri. They are counties that we are, in part, fighting to-day. When home guards came to my office in Springfield, Missouri, and asked me whether they should sell their claims, I told them no; that I was a home guard; that I was a field officer with them when that infernal rebel flag was raised in the town, and which we took down. I told them not to sell their claims, because the Government of the United States had ever been grateful for our service, and that it would at once pay us the money that was due to us. I tell you that the claims of the home guards in my district have not been sold. I know that exertions have been made by parties in New York city to buy the home guard claims of Missouri. I tell you, further, that you have never seen an assigned claim from my district. That district has not gone that far to win this appropriation now asked for. I know that these claims ought to have been paid twelve months ago. I know that speculators have tried to purchase the claims of the brave men who have bled and died for their country, but they have not succeeded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the following section of law which makes these assignments void:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all transfers and assignments hereafter made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless the same shall be freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof."

Mr. COX. I was aware of what the law is in that regard; and if every soldier out there and every soldier's widow were a lawyer, there would be no difficulty at all about stopping the payment of claims after assignment. But, sir, the soldiers who may have assigned these claims would never raise the question; they would rather acquiesce in the receipt of the money by these claims agents. Although the assignment is absolutely null and void, yet I do not think that fact would have any practical operation to benefit the soldier.

My friend from Wisconsin has drawn up an amendment in conformity with the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KING,] and if it meets the approbation of the House, as I suppose it will, I will accept it as a part of my amendment, to come in at the end of my amendment. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Provided further, That any person holding a power of attorney authorizing the receipt by him of the amount to be paid any officer or soldier, may, by making and filing an affidavit to the fact that he is acting in the premises as agent without personal interest, and that he will pay over the amount received, either to the soldier or to his widow or children, for their benefit, be entitled to receive such amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a single suggestion to my friend from Ohio. The report of these commissioners of course embodies all the facts upon which they have acted. It is not a very voluminous document, and will probably furnish more information upon the subject than could be furnished in any other way. I therefore ask my friend from Ohio to call for the reading of that paper.

Mr. COX. I have already occupied the floor longer than I expected, but I see the necessity of guarding this bill in order to direct the money to the right hands. I should be obliged—and I have no doubt the gentleman from Missouri would be obliged—for any suggestions from any quarter looking to the accomplishment of that purpose. I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri over the way, [Mr. BLOW,] asking that at the proper time the report shall be read.

Mr. BLOW. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order while there are amendments pending.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is still pending?

Mr. COX. It is. I have not withdrawn it. I accepted a modification of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I presume it is not desired to debate it any more, and I hope we shall take the vote; and then, whether it shall be voted down or adopted, let the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of calling for the reading of the report of the commissioners. It is not voluminous, and that is the only way of obtaining the necessary information. If it had been read when the bill was first taken up, we should have understood the matter much better.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will not consume the time of the committee by having the whole of that report read. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; not at this time.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the floor being yielded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask that the report be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor, and has a right to have it read as a part of his remarks.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to dispense with the reading of the report. It is a useless consumption of time. No one can hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has a right to have it read as a part of his speech.

Mr. HOLMAN. If gentlemen desire to take the responsibility of appropriating $700,000 without any consideration of the paper on which the appropriation is founded, I am not inclined to be captious. I should like to know what we are voting on; but inasmuch as there seems to be so much noise in the Hall as to render it impossible to understand the reading of the report, I withdraw the request.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Chairman, while it may be wholly unavailing, yet I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that Kentucky stands precisely in the same situation as Missouri in regard to these claims. There are quite a number of men in the State of Kentucky who have precisely the same claims, resting upon the same basis, as those of the Missouri home guards. They were called into the service as home guards. Many of these men rendered very arduous services. Some of them were wounded, some killed, without their having been regularly mustered into the service of the United States. Their claims stand precisely on the same ground as, and even call louder for relief than, the claims of the men who served under like circumstances in the department of Missouri. I think it improper, therefore, to proceed with this sort of partial and discriminating legislation. It is partial. It discriminates in favor of the soldiers of Missouri and against those of Kentucky. It is unjust in that respect.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this whole subject ought to be referred to the proper committee, the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill extending the provisions of this law to the State of Kentucky. I know, myself, numerous cases where men fell or were wounded in the service without their having been regularly mustered in. The exigencies of the circumstances were such that imperfect companies, not completed or organized, were hurried into the United States service. Many men of those companies were killed in battle, and others wounded or disabled for life.

Mr. ASHLEY. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Kentucky is not speaking to the question before the committee at all. This matter of the Missouri home guard has been referred to a commission, which has reported upon it; but no such commission has been sent to Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the question of order well taken. The debate must be confined to the bill before the committee.

Mr. HARDING. I am confining my remarks to that. I say this appropriation ought not to be made. I oppose the appropriation. And I oppose it for the reason that it is partial and unjust discrimination against a class of men in Kentucky who have as high claims upon the Government as the same class in Missouri. I intend, at the proper time, to move to refer the whole subject to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill extending the provisions of the law to Kentucky.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to remark to the gentleman from Kentucky, that I have just learned that the Senate has, within the last few minutes, amended the deficiency bill, so as to pay the troops who were irregularly mustered into service in Kentucky, covering the position for which the gentleman contends.

Mr. HARDING. If that be so, then the action of this House ought to correspond with the action of the Senate, and the whole matter ought to be suspended until equal justice can be done to the citizens of Kentucky and the citizens of Missouri. If I properly understood one of the gentlemen who spoke on this subject yesterday, the sum of $100,000 has been already paid to these soldiers in Missouri, whereas not a dime has been paid to any man similarly situated in Kentucky.

I desire also to state that when this matter was originally moved last Congress, I had a conference with the gentleman from Missouri who introduced it. I told him that it was unjust and impartial in excluding Kentucky; and he promised me that he would himself introduce an amendment extending its provisions to Kentucky. If the Senate is about to remedy this thing, let our action wait upon and conform to the action of the Senate. The thing is right in itself, but to discriminate between soldiers in Missouri and soldiers in Kentucky—paying the claims of the former and rejecting those of the latter—is absolutely unjust. There is no fear of claim agents operating with these men in Kentucky. The claims of these men have not even been recognized as existing claims. Equal justice should be done the soldiers of Kentucky and of Missouri. Both ought to be paid, or neither ought to be paid.

Mr. BLOW. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to submit the motion I have indicated—that the matter be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to amend the law so as to make it include Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. COX. What will become of my amendment if the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill still remains in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOVEJOY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 35, to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HARDING. I now submit my motion to refer with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order, the bill being still in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that all further debate on the bill and pending amendments be closed in one minute after the committee shall have resumed their consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LOVEJOY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 35, to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri; the question being on Mr. Cox's amendment.

Mr. Cox's amendment was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the bill and amendment be reported to the House, with the recommendation that they do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOVEJOY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. BLOW demanded the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the amendment was concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. BLOW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up one of the appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LOVEJOY in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be the President's annual message.

Mr. STEVENS moved that that be laid aside, and the committee take up the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the committee proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 34, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865.

The bill was read a first time for information, and then by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the bill by striking out these words:

For warming apparatus for academic and other buildings, $22,830.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For warming barracks, $15,000.

The estimates sent to the Committee of Ways and Means contained the amount of the printed bill, but on examination by the officers connected with that Academy, General Totten and others, it was deemed sufficient to appropriate $15,000 for warming the barracks, the other buildings being allowed to stand as they were. For that reason the Committee of Ways and Means have reported in favor of reducing the amount. As it is a reduction, I suppose that there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I rise, not for the purpose of discussing the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or to go into any general inquiry of the merits of the bill, but I desire to say, and I put it in this form that it may be brought to the notice of the House, that when this bill shall be reported back to the House, I hope that it will not be put on its passage under the previous question. If that be not done, I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I intend to make that motion for this reason: the Committee on Military Affairs of this House have before them memorials and petitions more or less connected with this subject, which involve an inquiry how far the operations of the Military Academy at West Point may be secured elsewhere, by aid and encouragement to the States. That is, how far military schools can be carried on, without the assistance of the Federal Government, on private account. It may be that some legislation to be undertaken by this House will be hereafter submitted from the Committee on Military Affairs that may approach in some degree what is desired. With the view of having the whole subject considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, I intend to submit that motion at the proper time, if the bill be not hastily passed under the demand for the previous question.

The amendment was agreed to

The Clerk read as follows:

For enlargement of chapel, $6,000.

Mr. STEVENS. Supposing that they will be able to get along with the old chapel a little longer, I move to strike that out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I only wish to say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who is the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that it seems to me that this, during a great war, is a bad time to reconstruct the Military Academy. I cannot agree that it should be suspended now. These appropriations are necessary to carry it on for next year, and I hope that the gentleman and his committee will prepare their bill to take effect in the future. These appropriations are necessary for the present organization of the Academy.

Mr. SCHENCK. I simply desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there would be a great deal of force in his objection if this appropriation were not for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865. The application of this appropriation will not commence for a period of six months. During that time we may agree on some other plan. This being so, I do not think that the remarks of the gentleman are applicable.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOVEJOY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Military Academy appropriation bill, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope we shall vote that down.

The question was put; and the House refused to second the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. If the motion of the gentleman from Ohio be voted down, will not the question recur on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The previous question will not be exhausted until the bill has been engrossed and read a third time, if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio shall be voted down.

The main question was then ordered; being first upon Mr. SCHENCK's motion.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were severally read and agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the States for resolutions, commencing where the call was last left off, with the State of Pennsylvania.

EXEMPTION EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. COFFROTH. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be directed immediately to inquire into the expediency of amending the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, to compel the provost marshals of the different congressional districts to hold their examinations for physical disability, or any other cause of exemption, at the county town of each county in the respective congressional districts.

I want to say but a single word upon this question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman debates the resolution it goes over, under the rule.

Mr. COFFROTH. Then I move the previous question, and I ask permission of the House to say a single word.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The previous question was not seconded.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the supreme judicial tribunal of the State of Pennsylvania has solemnly decided that the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1863, commonly called the conscription act, is, in its provisions, contrary to and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore null and void; Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sworn duty of the executive department of the Government to either acquiesce in that decision within that State, or to bring the question involved before the Supreme Court of the United States for final adjudication, to the end that, if Congress shall deem such legislation necessary, a bill may be prepared which shall not be subject to constitutional objections.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope my colleague will withdraw that resolution. He must know that since that decision was made Pennsylvania has overruled the decision. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alloy, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Crockett, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denney, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, High, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Longyear, Lovejoy, McClurg, Melndoe, Samuel P. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Windom, and Winfield—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—43.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed joint resolution No. 14, to supply, in part, deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask whether the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI HOME GUARD—AGAIN.

The business first in order on the Speaker's table was a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th instant, the report of the commissioners appointed to examine and report upon the claims of the officers and men employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The next business in order on the Speaker's table was joint resolution H. R. No. 14, to supply, in part, deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers, with Senate amendments.

The first amendment of the Senate was reported, to strike out all after the word "pay," in line nine, and insert as follows:

Provided, That no bounties except such as are now provided by law shall be paid to any persons enlisted after the 5th of January next.

And be it further resolved, That the money paid by drafted persons under the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved 3d March, 1863, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be drawn out on requisition, as in the case of other public moneys; and the money so paid shall be kept in the Treasury as a special deposit applicable only to the expenses of the draft and the procurement of substitutes, and for that purpose it is hereby appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment; and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the first amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The second amendment of the Senate was to amend the title by striking out the words "and premiums."

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House concur in this amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the title was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the votes by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO.

Mr. MOORHEAD offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the value and usefulness of the Ohio river, which passes through seven States of the Union, is frequently interfered with by a scarcity of water, so as to render it un navigable for large or heavy boats: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of improving the navigation of said stream, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by inserting the Committee on Commerce in lieu of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is pending, and no amendment is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not mean to take jurisdiction of this subject from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MOORHEAD. No, sir; but I think this is a very proper subject for the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and MOORHEAD, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on adopting the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 23, 1863.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Henry W. Lee, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of Iowa; and the petition of B. B. Smith, bishop of the diocese of Kentucky, and G. T. Bedell, assistant bishop of Ohio, praying that such a modification of the enrollment act may be made as will provide that clergymen and candidates for the ministry shall be regarded as non-combatants, and employed as chaplains or in hospitals; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Buffalo, New York, members of the Lutheran church, praying that such a modification of the enrollment act may be made as will exempt clergymen from draft; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of John R. Barber and others, inspectors of customs and revenue agents, connected with the port of Philadelphia, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of B. C. Bailey, praying for remuneration for expenses and damages sustained by him in consequence of the seizure and detention of the ship Argo, in May, 1861, by the commanding naval officer of the United States in Hampton Roads, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the heirs of John Chamberlain have leave to withdraw their petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the memorials and documents of the owners and captains of the ships Three Bells and Antarctic and the bark Kilby, which three vessels succeeded in rescuing the passengers, officers, and crew of the steamer San Francisco, that foundered at sea in the month of December, 1853, having then on board more than five hundred officers and soldiers of the United States Army, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 28) relating to members of Congress; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read it. It directs that no member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives of the United States shall, during his continuance in office, hereafter appear or act as counsel, attorney, or agent in any case or proceeding, civil or criminal, in any court, civil, criminal, military, or naval, or before any commission, in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested; or receive any compensation, of any kind, directly or indirectly, for services of any description rendered by himself or another, in relation to any such cause or proceeding. It further provides that no member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall, during his continuance in office, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, bureau, office, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever. Any person offending against any provision of this act is, on conviction thereof, to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and to be punished by a fine of not less than — dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not less than — years, and is to be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

Mr. WADE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I also ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 29) to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary; and at the same time, considering the character of the bill, I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made, and it will be ordered to be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 30) to establish a uniform system of ambulances in the armies of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

BILL REFERRED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. On my motion some days since, a joint resolution, which was introduced by me, on the subject of auditing the accounts for losses in the city of Lawrence, was laid on the table with a view of allowing me to make some remarks upon it previous to its reference. I now move to take it up with a view to refer it to the committee, so that they may act upon it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 4) authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint a board of officers to audit the accounts of the citizens of Lawrence, Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What committee shall it go to?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Committee on Military Affairs. I also ask to have it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred, and the order to print will be made if there be no objection.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Mr. CONNESS. While I was out of the Senate Chamber for a few minutes the other day, a report was received from the Treasury Department concerning matters relating to the customhouse in San Francisco, which was laid on the table. I desire to have that communication taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made, if there be no objection.

ENROLLMENT OF SLAVES.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether persons held to service or labor by the laws of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, have been enrolled according to the provisions of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and if not, the cause why such enrollment has not been made.

GENERALS WITHOUT COMMANDS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I laid a resolution on the table yesterday, which I ask to have taken up and acted upon at the present time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate with the names of all of the major and brigadier generals who are without commands equal to a brigade, stating how long each has been without such command, and whether each has a staff; and if so, how numerous, and of what rank, and what amount of pay, including commutations and rations, each, including those of his staff, has been receiving while so without a command; and also that he inform the Senate how many major and brigadier generals are in command of departments, districts, and posts in the loyal States; and whether any necessity exists that requires that these departments, districts, and posts should be commanded by officers of such high rank, with their numerous and expensive staffs.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House, providing for an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress from Wednesday, December 23, 1863, to Tuesday, January 5, 1864.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 34) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House (No. 14) to supply, in part, deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties and premiums to volunteers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following joint resolutions; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) to supply, in part, deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 34) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. HAY, his Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are some executive matters that should be disposed of.

The motion was agreed to; and, after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 23, 1863.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by WILLIAM HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House for adjournment over the holidays, with an amendment; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out the words, "this House," and insert the words, "two Houses of Congress;" so that it will provide for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress from Wednesday, December 23, to January 5, 1864.

The amendment was concurred in.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) to supply, in part, deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER announced that this being the day fixed for the appointment of three regents for the Smithsonian Institution, he had appointed Messrs. COX, DAVIS of Maryland, and PATTERSON.

BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER also announced that he had appointed the following as the select committee on the national bankrupt law: RUFUS P. SPALDING, of Ohio, WILLIAM D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, JAMES A. CRAVENS, of Indiana, SAMUEL HOOPER, of Massachusetts, AUGUSTUS FRANK, of New York, WILLIAM R. MORRISON, of Illinois, FRANCIS THOMAS, of Maryland, THOMAS A. JENCKES, of Rhode Island, and JOHN W. CHANLER, of New York.

CARMACK AND RAMSEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following letter of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House, adopted yesterday; which was read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, December 23, 1863.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the House resolution, adopted the 22d instant, requesting the Comptroller to suspend further proceedings in reference to the claim of Carmack & Ramsey, until the further action of Congress touching the same.

And I have the honor to inform the House that the case was argued and submitted for decision on the 15th instant by counsel of the claimants, and counsel representing the Post Office Department; but on the 16th instant, and before further consideration of the case, upon being informed of the introduction of a resolution on the subject in the House, I immediately announced to counsel of the claimants that the decision of the claim would be postponed, and await the action of Congress. This course I thought due to the House, without special request on the part of that body.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. W. TAYLOR, Comptroller.
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

REPORT OF GENERAL McCLELLAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House, the report of Major General George B. McClellan of the organization and operations of the army of the Potomac when under his command; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX submitted the following resolution:
Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the official report of Major General McClellan, not including the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members of the present House.

A MEMBER. How many?
Mr. COX. Ten thousand copies. It is the same number as that of General Pope's report which was ordered to be printed.
The resolution was adopted.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO.

The SPEAKER stated that the next question in order was the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] the pending question being to strike out "Committee on Naval Affairs" and insert "Committee on Commerce:"

Whereas the value and usefulness of the Ohio river, which passes through seven States of the Union, is frequently interfered with by a scarcity of water, so as to render it un-navigable for large or heavy boats: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of improving the navigation of said stream, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MOORHEAD. To do away with the necessity for the previous question, and for the yeas and nays, which have been ordered, I will modify the resolution so that it shall have reference only to naval and other purposes. That, I think, will remove the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the House agrees to that modification, I will withdraw my motion to refer to the Committee on Commerce. I objected yesterday because I thought that the Committee on Naval Affairs had no jurisdiction of the subject; and further, because I did not think that it was right to take it away from the Committee on Commerce, where it properly belonged.
The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

ARREARS OF PAY.

Mr. FENTON introduced a bill to facilitate the payment of bounties and arrears of pay due for the services of wounded and deceased soldiers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORT ON INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution to provide for the printing of the report made by the Superintendent of Internal Revenue to the Secretary of the Treasury.

I would simply say, Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, that previous to the establishment of this Department, we have ordered the reports of the Indian Bureau, of the Pension Bureau, and of some other bureau—I forget which of them —to be printed. This report in reference to internal revenue is of great interest throughout the country, and there is no provision for having the report printed. I hope the House will pass the resolution.

The joint resolution received its first and second readings, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOVEJOY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF DR. SYLVESTER NASH.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Sylvester Nash and Betsy Nash; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FENTON. I hope the committees may be called, and that then there may be unanimous consent for the introduction of bills for reference only.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we had better have the regular order of business.

Mr. LAW. I wish the gentleman would withdraw that call for one moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask leave to submit a resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, bill of the House No. 49, to create a Bureau of Military Justice.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the substitute was ordered to be printed.

THE ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to repeal section three, and part of section ten, of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill repeals the third section of the conscription act, and so much of the tenth section of that act as provides for a separate enrollment of two classes, and provides that the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act shall be consolidated.

The second section provides that the bill shall take effect and be in full force from and after its passage.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to explain, with the permission of the House, that the whole effect of this bill is simply to abolish the distinction of classes, and to make the draft operate upon all between the ages of twenty and forty-five. That is the whole scope of the bill. There is nothing else in it. That is the one amendment in regard to which the Committee on Military Affairs were unanimous, and it seems important that it should be acted on at once. I ask that the House will now consider the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I should like a little longer time to think of this bill. It proposes to make a very important change in the law. The law now allows married men between the ages of thirty-five and forty-five to be exempt from the first class, and provides that not only the married men under that age shall go into that class, but all single men up to the age of forty-five. That is the law now, as I understand it.

But there were nine months' men who were out in service at the time the law was passed, who have been in many battles. I know that the Pennsylvania nine months' men have lost about one half the number that they took out, and this amendment will affect them. They are now in the second class; but if this bill passes, they will be enrolled in the same class with those who have never been out at all, and who have never served the country in any degree.

Now, I am not very well satisfied that that should take place. I think it better that the law should stand as it is, for the present at least, and that it should be so arranged that those who have already been in service shall not be drafted until the others shall be drafted who have not been in the service at all. But the bill, as it now stands, will bring those who have just got out of the service right back on to the enrollment list, and make them liable to draft. I think that wrong.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had reported a bill to repeal entirely the law referred to, I should have been in favor of his proposition to consider the subject at this time; but as it is merely a proposition to amend that law, which is full of defects, and which requires such a general amendment and modification to make it effective, either as a revenue measure or as a measure to recruit our failing armies, I am in favor of time to deliberate upon it, and to give it the consideration which it requires. Therefore I hope that we shall not act on the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio at this time. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for the reading of the third and tenth sections of the enrolling act.

The sections were read by the Clerk.

Mr. STEVENS. If it is in order, I will move an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order now. The pending question is to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which is not debatable.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask leave to make a remark in reply to the objections made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] Considering the bill in its various effects on persons between the ages and of the classes provided for in the original bill, it will be seen that there is a good deal to be said on both sides. So far as married men between the ages of twenty and thirty-five are concerned, they are subject now to the draft. It will be remarked that, notwithstanding the early marriages in this country, such men, in the ordinary course of nature, cannot well be called into the field without leaving young children behind them. And if you consider the married men between the ages of thirty-five and forty-five, that objection does not apply with the same force; for in most instances, and especially as regards that class of men in the interior of the country, farmers and other working men, to be affected by this bill, they are usually in such condition, as regards the ages of their families, as to be better able to leave home than are those married men between the ages of twenty and thirty-five, who constitute the first class.

I do not, however, propose to occupy the time of the House now by discussing a matter which, it seems to me, lies so plainly on the surface that every one must have made up his mind as to the propriety of abolishing or not abolishing this distinction of classes. As I said before, that was the only subject on which the committee seemed to be unanimous. The gentleman on the other side [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] objects to the whole enrolling act, and would rather see a bill introduced for its entire repeal. I may say to him that while, perhaps, no such bill will be introduced, certainly no such bill will be reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. And yet that committee has been assiduously engaged in a revision of that whole act, with a view to its amendment in several other particulars, regarding questions of exemption and other matters. This, however, was an amendment for which there appeared to be urgency now, before the adjournment of both Houses; and being instructed accordingly to present a bill embracing this one feature at this time, and no other, reserving everything else for future report and consideration of the House, I hope that the House will vote down the motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that this bill will receive, as I believe will be the next consequence, a vote upon its merits, and will be passed. I move the previous question on its engrossment and third reading.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to propose an amendment before he moves the previous question. It is to provide that this act shall not affect the condition of those persons who were in military service at the time the act was passed to which this is an amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. The bill, as it stands, will probably induce all these men to volunteer. We had better leave the bill as it is.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I will vote against the whole.

The question being on the previous question, the Speaker ordered tellers; and Messrs. GRINNELL, and STEELE, of New York, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 50.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The question recurred on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

IOWA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. GRINNELL. I rise to a question of privilege. Finding in the room of the Committee of Elections papers purporting to relate to a contest of my seat in this House, which I had been informed would not be brought into the House, I desire to present papers in this case to the Committee of Elections, and have the same considered with reference to printing.

The papers were referred to the Committee of Elections.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEVENS. There is barely a quorum present, and I think we had better adjourn. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FENTON. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw that motion until we shall have had a call of States for bills for reference only. It can be done by consent.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I have no objection. The call of committees for reports was proceeded with and concluded.

COAL OIL.

Mr. A. MYERS introduced a bill to reduce the tax on coal oil, to repeal so much of the present law as permits exportation of oil free of duty, and to classify coal-oil distillers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. A. MYERS also introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. A. MYERS also introduced a bill granting bounties, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POSTAL MONEY ORDERS.

Mr. ANCONA introduced a bill to establish a postal money order system; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. ANCONA submitted the following resolution:

Whereas the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1863, commonly called the conscription law, is oppressive, unjust, and unconstitutional; because, 1st, it takes from the States the control of their own militia; 2d, it subjects the rights of the States and the liberties of the people to the unlimited power of the Federal Government; 3d, it is calculated to create and build up a central military despotism which may be used for the worst and most dangerous purposes; 4th, it falsely imputes the crime of desertion to every man whose name is drawn in the "lottery of death," and who fails to join the Army, and subjects him to trial, condemnation, and capital punishment, without a jury of his peers, contrary to the fundamental law of the land: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to bring in a bill for the unconditional repeal of said act of Congress, and substitute in its place some constitutional and just mode of raising armies for the service of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I propose to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then it goes over, under the rules.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at ten minutes to one o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1864.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Wednesday, December 23, 1863, was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting, in obedience to law, the report of the recorder of land titles at St. Louis, Missouri, relative to the claim of Augustin Amiot or his legal representatives to a lot in the city of St. Louis; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 22d of December, 1863, a roster of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 21st of December, 1863, a list of officers of the Navy and of the marine corps who, between the 1st day of December, 1860, and the 1st day of December, 1863, left the service; which, on motion of Mr. MORGAN, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TEN EYCK presented a petition of regular branch pilots of the Delaware bay and river, praying for the passage of such a law as will exempt them from the operations of the draft, on account of their services; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a memorial of the common council of the city of St. Paul, praying for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul to the head of Lake Superior. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be so referred; and the motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CLARK presented two petitions of citizens of Temple, New Hampshire, praying for the establishment of a uniform ambulance and hospital system for the armies of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. GRIMES. I present a petition from the comrades-in-arms of Captain Frederick S. Washburn, who commanded the ninth Iowa regiment and fell at the head of it at the battle of Black River, near Vicksburg, praying that a pension be granted to his widow and children. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I also present the memorial of Henry P. Scholte, a foreign-born citizen of Iowa, who has resided in that State for the last twenty-five years, who proposes some modifications and changes in the enrollment law. He states that the British theory, "once a citizen, always a citizen," is not a theory known to the civil law, or adopted by any of the nations of continental Europe, and that it ought not to be adopted by this country as the true doctrine upon which to act, but that every foreign-born person who is a resident of this country should be compelled to bear arms in behalf of the Government. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present, also, the petition of sundry citizens of Iowa and of Erie county, in the State of New York, known as the trustees and members of a society called the Amana Society. They state, in their memorial, that their society was organized about 1717-20, in Europe; that some twenty-five or thirty years ago they came to this country and established a society called the Ebenezer Society in the vicinity of Buffalo, in the State of New York; that one of the tenets of their faith is non-resistance. In their memorial they express no indisposition to pay a commutation for military service, but they protest against the repeal of that portion of the conscription law which authorizes the payment of $300 in lieu of military service. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends, residing in the eastern part of Indiana and the western part of Ohio, represented by their meeting held at Richmond, Indiana, praying that they may be exempted from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the commissioner's court held in Laporte, Indiana, praying for an increase of the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates in the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 31) making a grant of lands to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 32) granting lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of a wagon road for postal and military purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NESMITH, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 33) providing for the establishment of a branch mint of the United States at Portland, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FOOT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 34) in favor of the legal representatives of Israel C. Wait; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 35) to increase the bounty of volunteers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Military Affairs is the proper committee, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRIMES. The bill which the Senator has introduced relates purely, according to its title, to military officers in the service of the United States; and manifestly the proper committee to have charge of a bill of that kind is the Military Committee. It would be interfering with the prerogatives of that committee, it seems to me, to send such a bill to another committee.

Mr. CLARK. No question of law arises.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; no question arises connected with any of the laws of Congress now in existence, or the Constitution, as far as I know.

Mr. POWELL. I take it that the Judiciary Committee is the proper committee to which this bill should be referred. It is a bill prescribing penalties against officers of the Army and Navy for interfering with elections. I think it is eminently proper that it should go to the Judiciary Committee and be there perfected. The bill does not contemplate anything to regulate the Army, but to prevent officers of the Army and Navy from interfering with the rights of citizens in holding elections. I hope it may be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being put, a division was asked for.

Mr. McDUGALL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I move that it lie on the table for the present. We can take it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. POWELL rose.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is in order, and is not a matter of debate.

The question being put, the Vice President declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. If you divide, you break up the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. Let it break up. If I cannot get a bill of this importance sent where I want it, I am willing to break up.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ENROLLMENT LAW.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken, as it is possible it may result in showing that there is no quorum, I should like to give notice of an amendment which I desire to move to the Senate bill No. 18, entitled "An act to amend an act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," it being in the nature of an additional section.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer it now, and ask that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to its reception. The order to print will be made, if no objection is interposed.

Before taking the vote on Mr. POWELL's motion, other business was interposed by unanimous consent, namely:

SANITARY CONDITION OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to inquire whether additional legislation is necessary to improve the sanitary condition of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and for the prevention of contagious diseases.

APPOINTMENTS OF CADETS.

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the Senate the names of all persons appointed cadets at the United States Military Academy during the year 1863, specifying the State of which they were citizens, or resident, at the time of their appointment, and the residence of their parents or guardians; and where such appointments were made upon the designation of a member of the House of Representatives, that he furnish the name of the member by whom the designation was made; and where made from the Army, that he state the regiment from which such appointments were made.

SOLOMON KOHNSTAMM.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession relative to the case of Solomon Kohnstamm, of New York, charged with obtaining money upon false and fraudulent claims for collecting, drilling, organizing, and subsisting volunteers.

RETURN OF ORIGINAL PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit to the Secretary of War the original papers accompanying his report of the 28th of June, 1862, in relation to the battles at Pittsburg Landing.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolutions for consideration; which were laid over, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That the Government of the United States be established by the people of States which had before been separate, sovereign, and independent; and they formed their common national government by a written Constitution, and delegated to it so much of their sovereign political power as they adjudged to be necessary and proper to enable it to manage all their affairs with foreign nations and among the several States; and, both by its leading principle and an express provision, they reserved "to the States respectively, or to the people," all "powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States."

2. Resolved, That our system consists of a limited national government for the whole United States, of supreme authority as to all the powers with which the Constitution has invested it; and State governments for each State, formed by the people thereof, and holding the entire residuum of political sovereignty within their respective States, each government, within its sphere, being alike supreme. And as the Governors, and all other civil and military officers of the States, as other individuals, may commit treason against the United States, by levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," so the President of the United States, and the civil and military officers thereof, may commit treason against any State whose government is in the performance of its duties under the Federal Constitution, by levying war against it, or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort, as resisting with an armed force the execution of its laws, or adhering to such armed force, giving it aid and comfort.

3. Resolved, That in all the States and parts of States where the laws of the United States and the States can be executed, the military authorities should not be brought into conflict with the civil power, but should be strictly held to be, as they rightfully are, in subordination to it.

4. Resolved, That all elections to civil offices, Federal or State, should be in strict accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of the States respectively, and be conducted by officers appointed by the proper authorities for that purpose; and where, from the presence or apprehension of force, violence, or other cause, any election cannot be so conducted, it ought not to be held at all; and every election at which any military force may interfere by imposing additional oaths or qualifications of the electors, or regulations for conducting the said election, or by changing or modifying the oaths and qualifications of the electors or regulations to govern it as provided by law, or to constrain, control, or direct the officers of such election in conducting it, should be held to be void and of no effect.

5. Resolved, That the experience of the world proves that there can be neither security nor liberty in any country without wise and just laws firmly sustained and uniformly executed. That is the life, the spirit, the soul of this nation; and all neglect and departure from law, and particularly from constitutional law, by agents appointed to administer it, although sometimes attended with seeming advantage, are sure to produce always, sooner or later, much greater and more enduring mischief. Wherefore a disregard of law by such agents is never tolerated by a wise and free people.

6. Resolved, That the powers of the Government of the United States are derived wholly from and limited by the Constitution, and by it are divided into legislative, executive, and judicial, and each class of those powers is vested in a separate department; that the President is the chief of the executive department, and has no legislative or judicial power whatever, and only such executive powers as are enumerated in the second and third sections of the second article of the Constitution, and such other powers as may be, from time to time, conferred upon him by Congress in virtue of this provision: "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

7. Resolved, That the President cannot be divested of any of the powers with which he is directly invested by the Constitution, nor controlled nor interfered with in their execution; but all powers conferred on him by law of Congress he holds in subordination to that department, which may supervise, modify, and correct his execution of them, or resume them by repealing the laws intrusting their execution to him.

8. Resolved, That the power of the President to recognize the existence of a state of case amounting to "an invasion, or imminent danger of invasion, of the United States," or "an insurrection in any State against the government thereof," or "obstruction to the execution of the laws of the United States by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings," and to call forth the military power to meet such conditions, is conferred on him by the laws of Congress, and the repeal of those laws would withdraw from the President all that power.

9. Resolved, That Congress is invested with the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;" "to raise and support armies;" "to provide and maintain a navy;" "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;" "to provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia, and governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States;" "to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and to protect each of them against invasion;" and thus the entire war power, and quasi war power, external and internal, of the Government, is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and no part of it whatever in the President.

10. Resolved, That whenever there is an insurrection in the United States, Congress is vested with the power to suppress it and with no other power whatever over the insurrection; and when it is suppressed, either by the arms of the United States, or by the submission of the insurgents to the Constitution, laws, and authorities thereof, thereupon the power of Congress is exhausted, and the insurgents are immediately remitted to all their rights, liberties, privileges, and duties of citizens, subject to such forfeiture thereof as may have been declared by law, after it shall have been adjudged by the civil courts in the mode prescribed by the Constitution; and Congress, much less the President, has no power to impose upon them any other terms or conditions.

11. Resolved, That the whole power and duty of the President in the existing insurrection is to grant pardons to those engaged in it, and, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to direct their operations for its suppression; and, as such, his powers are strictly military, and are not different or greater than would be those of the senior general in the service, if the Constitution had designated him to be the Commander-in-Chief; the power to devise a policy or measures for its suppression is legislative, to which the President is incompetent, whether as the first executive officer of the Government, or Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

12. Resolved, That the law of military necessity is not established, but only tolerated, in the United States. It does not, nor cannot, in peace or war, abrogate or suspend the Constitution, in whole or in part. It cannot authorize arbitrary arrests and imprisonment, or in any way interfere with the person of the citizen, but only with his property. It does not appertain to the President, or to the Commander-in-Chief, unless he be in the actual command of a military force, and then only under particular circumstances. It results from a present and urgent need of an army, or military corps, which is so pressing that it cannot await other modes, but must be supplied anywhere within its reach by its own power and action. It is not an expediency but a necessity of a military body, and creates a law and confers a power, for the occasion only, on its commander, of whatever grade he may be, to supply that necessity by taking property with summary military force, without depriving the owner of his right to be compensated for it by the United States. Each case of military necessity makes its own law, adapted to its own peculiar circumstances, and expiring with that particular necessity. There is not, and cannot be, any uniform, permanent, or even continuing law of military necessity. The idea that a law always accidental, evanescent, and in truth so inconsiderable, should have the magic force to enable Abraham Lincoln to bound over the Constitution and all its limitations and restrictions, and clutch the vast powers which he claims under it, is a gigantic absurdity.

13. Resolved, That at the beginning, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power professed to carry it on for the constitutional end to put down the rebellion and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease. But more than a year ago, another and paramount and unconstitutional end, the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them; and, at length, to carry on the war in this perverted and augmented form, the annual expenditure on the part of the United States has swollen to one hundred thousand lives, a much larger amount of personal disability, and a thousand millions of money, and yet the wisest cannot see the end of the war. Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war-leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers and spoilers, in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter, and to restore their union and common government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates.

14. Resolved, That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted, for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and the United States, the civil courts and trial by jury. It has ordered, ad libitum, arbitrary arrests by military officers, not only without warrant, but without any charge or imputation of crime or offense, and has hurried the persons so arrested from home and vicinity to distant prisons, and kept them incarcerated there for an indefinite time, some of whom it discharged without trial and in utter ignorance of the cause of their arrest and imprisonment, and others it caused to be brought before courts created by itself, and to be tried and punished without law; in violation of the constitutional guarantee to the citizen of his right to keep and bear arms, and of his rights of property, it has forcibly deprived, as well the loyal as the disloyal, of both; it has usurped the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and to proclaim martial law, and has established military tribunals in States and parts of States where there was no obstruction to the due administration of the laws of the United States and the States, by the civil courts and authorities; and ordered many citizens, who were not connected with the Army or Navy, to be dragged before its drum-head courts, and to be tried by them for new and strange offenses, declared by itself, and by an undefined and indefinite law, being but the arbitrary will of the court; ordained at pleasure a military despotism in the loyal States by means of courts-martial, provost marshals, and military forces, governed neither by law, principles, nor rules, from whose tyranny and oppressions no man can claim immunity; all of which must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people.

15. Resolved, That a free press, free speech, and free elections are the great and peaceful forces by which the maladministration of our Government, whether in the legislative or executive department, is prevented, reformed, or reversed, and its authors brought to public condemnation and punishment; and those bulwarks of constitutional government and popular liberty are formidable to malversators, usurpers, and tyrants only, and they must be upheld by the people at all hazards.

16. Resolved, That as the Constitution and laws afford no means to exclude from the office of President a man appointed to it by military power, or who is declared to be chosen to it by reason of the suppression of the freedom of election, or by the exclusion of legal voters from the polls, or by any other means, the people of the United States would be incompetent to defend and unworthy to have received the rich heritage of freedom bequeathed to them

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 7.

by their fathers, if they permit that great office so to be filled, or in any other mode than by their own free suffrages.

17. Resolved, That the scheme of the President to bring back the insurgent States is open to many and insuperable objections. The pardon and amnesty offered by him is upon the condition that those who accept it shall renounce their right to their slave property, and swear to support his unconstitutional proclamation and unconstitutional acts of Congress, which attempted to take it from them. He must have intended to put this condition in a form so obnoxious as to secure its rejection by most of those to whom it was offered. He affects the position that ten of the insurgent States have forfeited or dissolved their State governments, and requires that they be reconstructed on a condition prescribed by himself; and this against the true principle, which he and the legislative department of the Government had previously recognized—that all the acts of the insurgent States and people tending to their secession, separation, and independence were void; and when the inauguration with which their insurrection covered over the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States in them passed away, it would leave the constitutions, laws, property, and institutions of those States in every respect the same that they were previously, excepting only the changes that were produced by the mere shock of arms, the principle status ante bellum being applicable. He ignores the constitutions of Tennessee, Arkansas, and others that have not been altered in any particular, but are the same that they were before their revolt; and he requires those States to repudiate their constitutions that governed them many years peacefully in the Union, and to form new ones. He has no right to take cognizance in any way of the governments and constitutions of those States, or any other States: to the extent that such a power is vested in the Government of the United States, it is congressional, not presidential. He has no authority whatever to impose any conditions on the insurgents, and they are subject to none but what are prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to be determined by their courts. What right has the President to proclaim that one tenth of as many of the voters of those States as voted at the last presidential election may pull down and revolutionize their State governments, and erect new ones for the other nine tenths, which he will recognize and uphold with the armies and navies of the United States? His project is to continue the war upon slavery by his further usurpations of power, and to get together and buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers in the rebel States, give them possession of the polls by interposing the bayonet, as in Maryland, Delaware, and portions of Missouri and Kentucky, and to keep off loyal pro-slavery voters; and thus to form bastard constitutions to abolitionize those States.

18. Resolved, That the impending destiny of our country can no longer be blinked. The people of the loyal States are resolved into two great parties, the destructives and the conservatives. The first consists of Abraham Lincoln, his office-holders, contractors, and other followers; the second of all men who are for ejecting Lincoln and his party from office and power. The professed objects of the first are to preserve the Union and to abolish slavery in all the States; they have about ceased to make a pretense of supporting the Constitution and the laws; their real objects are to perpetuate their party power, and to hold possession of the Government to continue the aggrandizement of their leaders, great and small, by almost countless offices and employments, by myriads of plundering contracts, and by putting up to sale the largest amount of spoils that were ever offered to market by any Government on earth. Their object is not to eradicate slavery, but only to abolish its form and the mastery. To subjugate wholly the rebel States, and utterly to revolutionize their political and social organization; to destroy or banish and strip of their property all the pro-slavery people, secessionists, anti-secessionists, loyal and disloyal, combatants and non-combatants, old men, women, and children, the decrepit and the non compos mentis, all whom they cannot abolish, and to distribute the lands of the subjugated people among their followers, as was done by the Roman conquerors of their own countrymen; to proclaim a mock freedom to the slaves, but by military power to take possession of the freedmen and work them for their own profit; to do all this, and also to enslave the white man by trampling under foot the Constitution and laws of the United States and the States, by the power of a subsidized Army, and, lest it should falter, by hundreds of thousands of negro janitorians, organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General. The first and paramount object of the conservatives is to preserve their own liberties by saving the Union, the Constitution, and the laws from utter and final overthrow by the destructives, not themselves to be enslaved under pretext of giving a fictitious freedom to the negro; and to restore and perpetuate the Union, and to bring back the people in revolt by renewed and sufficient guarantees of all their constitutional rights. There is no choice left to any man but to be a destructive or conservative!

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay the bill of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] upon the table.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to lay upon the table. I made the motion in order, if possible, to avoid dividing the Senate; but I find that will not do it, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion. Let the vote be taken upon the reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the motion? The Chair hears none. That motion is withdrawn; and the question before the Senate is on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Davis, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Morgan, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wade—15.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE UNION.

Mr. TEN EYCK. As there does not seem to be much business to be done just now, and probably in the course of a few minutes a Senator may come in, so that we shall have a quorum, I desire now, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, to make a motion, and submit a few remarks upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is now dividing.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be done by unanimous consent. I hope the gentleman will have leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks the unanimous consent of the Senate at this stage of the proceedings to introduce a proposition and make remarks upon it. If there be no objection, it will be entertained. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I move that so much of the annual message of the President of the United States as relates to the subject of reconstruction in several of the States be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The President of the United States in his last annual message speaks as follows:

"Looking now to the present and future, and with reference to a resumption of the national authority within the States wherein that authority has been suspended, I have thought fit to issue a proclamation, a copy of which is herewith transmitted."

And again:

"The suggestion in the proclamation as to maintaining the political framework of the States, on what is called reconstruction, is made in the hope that it may do good, without danger of harm. It will save labor and avoid great confusion."

The proclamation thus referred to contains these words:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.'"

Bills have been already introduced upon this subject, providing provisional governments for these rebellious States; and at a former session bills were reported and partly acted on to reduce them to the territorial state. I wish to make a few remarks upon the subject.

The Constitution reads as follows:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

This supreme authority cannot now be questioned; for although the States, in many respects, still remain sovereign and independent, yet as regards the powers expressly delegated to the Federal Government or conferred by necessary implication, they are subordinate.

The source from which this power springs is unimpeachable, even by the fiercest stickler for the rights of States; for the State governments derive their being from the very source which has conferred this supreme authority on the General Government, namely, from the people. Did the people of the several States frame or adopt their State governments? So did the people, through their appointed agents, frame and adopt the Constitution of the United States.

It was not a league, confederation, or, as some have called it, a copartnership of States, but a fundamental constitution of government for the whole people of all the States, for the purposes therein declared, and to the extent therein designated; a sort of imperium in imperio, so far at least as regards all matters made subject to its power, and yet limited in its scope, so far as not to interfere with matters of internal, individual, and domestic concern reserved to the several States or to the people of the States. The instrument itself declares that "we, the people of the United States"—not we the States, nor yet we the people of the several States—"in order to form a more perfect union, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

As regards the States existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the instrument itself declares that "the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." It was ratified by all the people of the original States through their conventions, and thus became to these a Government, obligatory and supreme, acting on each as individuals, directly and immediately, not simply on the States, as under the Confederation.

As regards other and future States to be admitted in the Union, it was, in the second article, declared: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Under this provision many different communities and many teeming millions have found a mild, benignant Government, and have grown great and prosperous and happy.

Thus full provision was made for each class of States, the old States and the new, "to enter into the Union"—to enter into the Union in order that justice might be established, that domestic tranquillity might be insured, provision be made for the common defense, the general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty secured to the framers and their posterity, and that a more perfect union might be formed, more perfect than had before existed under the Articles of Confederation; a perpetual union, an everlasting bond of union; not temporary or evanescent, to fade away or perish from the earth; not to be broken, severed, set at naught, but to last, to last forever, to bless the coming years and all the people of the western world.

And so provision was also made "to enter in the Union," exempt from change or alteration, save and except in the quiet, peaceful way provided by amendment, in the mode and manner furnished by the instrument itself. There was no provision framed to break or terminate the bond, suggesting dissolution or an end; there was no lurking clause hinting at it, even. No backward step was contemplated, but always forward, onward to perpetuity—perfection! This was the noble purpose, thought, design. Men might die and pass away, the noble framers of the Government might sink to honored graves, but the institutions they had founded were to live, to live forever, and grow and flourish with succeeding ages. A State was born amidst the nations of the earth to live and last forever. The Constitution opened wide its portals to admit new States into the Union, but it closely barred the door against all exit from its fond embrace.

Now, what do we see? An effort to destroy this Union; a rebellion, causeless, unprovoked, and cruel; a struggle to disrupt and utterly destroy it; the plea, "a right to end the partnership," so called; secession from the Union claimed to be a right, and plunder, war, and bloodshed agents to accomplish it; armed rebels in the States striving to cast aside their sworn allegiance; ordinances of secession hurried swiftly through by force or fraud, while fierce revolt has raised its wicked hand and loosed for months the horrors of a civil war. The struggle has been long and fierce; but the progress of the Union arms has steadily advanced. Districts have been wrested from insurgents. Whole States have been reclaimed. Civil officers, who broke their oaths and entered in rebellion have fled from posts made forfeit by their treason, and government in many States has found an end or fallen in abeyance.

What shall now be done? Shall we reduce these States to Territories? Shall we appoint their judges, governors, and other officers? Shall we, in common with insurgents, ignore their status in the Union, and sink their loyal people to a state of pupillage? Would that be constitutional? Go search the text for the authority. Shall we admit this heresy at last? Shall many thousand millions have been spent in vain, and many hundred thousand precious lives been sacrificed, to crush this thing accursed, and we acknowledge it a fact accomplished? Shall we, by taking such a course ourselves, do that which secret rebel conclaves and traitors in the field have wholly failed to do? What right have we to say to Tennessee, to Mississippi, or to Texas—the loyal people there—"You no longer constitute a State, but are the people of a Territory—your State governments are gone?" The loyal people of a State, although controlled by traitors, still represent the State; it is the people, not the soil, that constitute the State. Have all the people gone away and left it uninhabited? Then, indeed, the State is gone. But if there are loyal, patriotic hearts within the State still clinging to the Union, the fact must be acknowledged. All true and loyal citizens have claims to be respected. The Government is bound by law to guaranty their rights. The functions of State governments may have been suspended, and law and order for a time ignored; still the doctrine of the Constitution is, "once a State, always a State." It would be as false against our Government to say these are no longer States because their action has been thus suspended, as it would to common sense to say, because a man is hindered of his freedom he no longer is a man, or that if palsied for a length of time, his whole humanity is gone.

Although insurgents, for a time, have beaten back legitimate authority, these States are in the Union; and as the Government asserts its rule, the true and loyal people in these States, and such as may avail themselves of proffered amnesty, should have their rights secured. It is true it will not be precisely as it was before the war began. You could as well call back to life the soldiers slain in battle. Where other rights have intervened, arising from a state of war, and under laws enacted, pending the rebellion, to bring it to a close, some rights have passed away. I refer to those affected by emancipation, and the acts of Congress confiscating rebel property. For confiscation of the property of rebels is expressly granted by the Constitution; and emancipation of the slave is based upon a state of war, in which the spoiling of the foe is lawful and legitimate—it breaks his force of power and destroys his strength. Where rights have intervened under such enactments, they must be protected; where property has changed, the title must hold good. This is the doctrine of all public law.

And as regards the slaves of loyal masters in rebellious States; surely, if their goods and chattels may be taken for the public use, (their horses and their other property, their houses taken or destroyed,) making a just compensation, the Government may free their slaves, or use them in the Army, making satisfaction for the loss, and free the slave himself, by way of guerdon for his public service.

But to return. Resistance to the rightful power of the Union can no more take a State out of the Union than can resistance in a county destroy the jurisdiction of the State. The laws may be contemned; resistance may be made by force of arms; rebellion run its wicked course, and, for a time, authority cast off; but once the force subdued, "the head and front" destroyed, the laws will then resume their former sway without re-creation. Indeed, there could be none. It is a county still, and needs the passage of no law to reestablish or create it. It only reassumes its former lawful functions.

So in the case before us. The President, with practical good sense, has, in his message and accompanying proclamation, "hit the nail upon the head," and opened up a way. There needs no new creation. Destroy the rebel arms, the counteracting forces. Drive armed insurgents from the rebel States. Let loyal men assert their former rights. The Government is theirs. Let them proceed to organize; events will shape the mode. Let them elect their officers; let them revive suspended government, and let us here, with all our powers, protect them in the movement. This will solve the question; this will meet the issue. The plan proposed by the Executive is wise and just, far-reaching, statesmanlike, and patriotic. It is a sound and good suggestion, and should be regarded. It is hard to see how any other course could even be adopted. It just suits a State where treason has been crushed. It is an easy, quiet mode, free from shock and strife, dispute and controversy; it "sets the ball in motion," reanimates suspended life, and starts the State anew upon the road to greatness.

Why should it not be so? Should not the loyal people of a State, devoted in their hearts, enjoy this privilege? Are not one tenth the former voters in the States sufficient for the purpose? Their numbers are as great as those of many of the States when taken in the Union; as great as other States now asking for admission.

Two years ago a bill was pending in the Senate creating governments for the rebellious States. In July, 1862, I made a few remarks upon the bill and its amendments. They were, in part, as follows:

"I doubt the expediency of this bill. I think it will do more harm than good, and am inclined to vote against it on its passage." * * * "In my judgment we cannot so amend this bill as to steer clear of the embarrassing difficulties that rise up in our path as we progress. In our efforts to do a thing which is to be of benefit to the country, we are stumbling into errors which will result to its disadvantage. I think the whole policy of the bill is false upon its basis. In my view, States in rebellion, as the southern States now are, are still States of this Union, as much to-day as they were when they became so by their admission in the Union, and that no act of insurrectionists or rebels can change the legal character or status of these States from that which they were entitled to or enjoyed prior to the commencement of rebellion; and that to recognize any other doctrine, acknowledges at least the power, if not the right, of secession." * * * "Under our frame of Government there can be no such thing. The Union was meant to be perpetual; and if such a thing, in fact, exists, it is because the Federal Government has not sufficient strength to force obedience to its powers.

"In my view, the people of a State constitute the State; that a State is not constituted by a mere ideal line or boundary of territory; for if the territory be devoid of men, it cannot be a State. The people constitute the State. If there be a hundred loyal Union men in one of these rebellious States, and all the rest are rebels and deserve destruction, they constitute the State, and are entitled to the blessings and immunities of their State governments. Nay, more; the Government of the Union, under the Constitution, is bound to protect them in their State governments, and to secure to them a government republican in form. This can be done; and by the course which may be now pursued, and has already been pursued, we steer clear of all these constitutional and other difficulties; all those difficulties respecting policy; all those matters that affect our feelings, sympathies, our sense of justice and of right. We may assert control over these rebellious States, as we already have begun to do, and successfully are doing in the State of Tennessee, by the appointment of a military governor, who, armed with the whole power of the General Government, as the agent of the Government in a state of war, puts down rebellion and maintains the laws, so far as they can be enforced under such a state of things."

"Sir, the remedy should be summary, speedy, and also temporary in its character. This bill provides for a provisional government in a State, against the State government. It frames and organizes an antagonistic government to the one which the true and loyal people living in these States have a right to have maintained for their protection. I cannot see my way in voting for a bill establishing a separate antagonistic government to the one established by the people of the State, and which the Government of the United States has guaranteed to maintain and perpetuate for the benefit of the people living in those States where, so far as I know and now believe, there are hundreds and doubtless thousands of Union-loving men who desire to return to their allegiance, and who will hail the day when the power of the Government shall be established over them, to protect them in their rights, to protect them from the wrongs which have been heaped on them at home, to the scandal of a Christian people, and to the scandal of the Christian world."

In States where the rebellion still holds sway, other means must be adopted, other steps must be resorted to. They are not ripe for this, as Louisiana is. There the tramp of armed men must still be heard; there the battle still must fiercely rage; there the fight must still go on; necessity requires it; the safety of us all demands it. We cannot live thus side by side in peace, two rival, angry Powers. Could a truce take place, peace would not long continue; mutual jealousies and hates would quickly breed contentions; there could not be "two Richmonds in the field." No; rebellion must be crushed; the limits of the nation's right must be its former border; the ancient landmarks must be reestablished; authority and sway must be reasserted; and the flag of the Union wave on spots now blasted by rebellion. We cannot stop short of this. Stop short of this, and we prove traitors to our bounden duty. Stop short of this, and we do wrong to those who now are in, or have been in, the service, on land and sea; prove traitors to our country, which has done so much, borne so much, and endured so much; to the sick and wounded in the hospitals, or moving round on crutches; to the many maimed and mangled; to the honored dead; to homes of desolation; to the orphan and the widow; to the bereaved and desolate of the whole land!

Sir, I feel that I have had no hand in setting this fierce war on foot; but I, for one, will not consent that it shall ever cease until each rebel hand against the Government is brought beneath its undisputed sway.

This is being fast accomplished; events swift hurry on. Secession has been cut in two, and now is seared on all its outward borders. The Union force is moving forward, and though the current may from time to time, by temporary checks, be eddied on its surface, still the volume, sweeping on, moves eddies, ripples, everything before it. The progress of our arms, by land and sea, by river and by lake, has been successful. The victories of Vicksburg, New Orleans, and Hudson have opened up the river of the West, and Murfreesboro', Donelson, and Chattanooga have secured the valley. Antietam and Gettysburg have hurled rebellion back, and the cannon of our navies boom down along the coast. Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Tennessee, Louisiana, West Virginia, and a part of North Carolina have been reclaimed, and loyal thousands held in abject thrall have hurried forth to meet the great restorer.

To some the work seems slow. Never did so great a work move forward with such swiftness. Never has so much been done within so short a time. Treason, for thirty years plotted and contrived, deep-rooted, wide-extended, unsuspected, unprovided for, has been driven back and forced within contracted limits, and destitution, want, and death have fallen backward with it.

There is no cause to fear. Blockade-running has been broken up. Charleston soon will fall. Rebel armies soon must dwindle, by dissolving causes, (the pardon now held out will greatly aid the thing,) and though for months there may be show of fighting, like broken clouds, when the main storm is passed the effort will be feeble, unimportant, fitful.

There can be no other end. The people of the North have so resolved it. The loyal people of the middle States are equally determined. No matter how they strive on less important topics, in this one great, absorbing thing, the safety of the Union, they one and all unite. No matter what their differences, no matter how they jar on other points, in this they all agree—an earnest, energetic conduct of the war. This is in the mouths of all, and in the hearts of all. I say of all: the sneaking, wretched few who sympathize with traitors are harmless as to power. The late elections prove this to be so. The million voters speak a voice that cannot be denied. They will produce the men to fight, and, more than that, they will advance the means to keep them in the service. They send their sons and neighbors to the field; they go themselves; they freely offer up their choicest gifts. They take the public loans; sustain the public credit; supply the nation's fisc; support its able head, who strikes the rock whence flow the streams by which the public wants are all supplied. It is the people's war; springs from devotion to the public good; the memory of the past—their fathers' deeds; their fondest future hopes; their duty to their kind; their duty to their God. They feel it to be so, and feeling, act upon it. The young go in the ranks; the aged lend their means; all give a helping hand. The rich advance their thousands, the poor invest their pittance; the trust is universal, the spectacle sublime. The Government directs the war; men, children, widows, orphans, rich and poor, supply the ready means; their faith is firmly fixed; they do not hesitate; they venture all they have, (they now have all at stake.) They act on due reflection; they never will turn back. The day the people took the public loan, that day the end was sure.

Nor can interference from another source prevent it. No foreign aid or sympathy, no recognition as a State or nation, no calculating policy of gain, no chronic hate of institutions, no jealousy of greatness, no anxious wish of absolute exclusives, ever can prevent it. English "noble lords," the friends of ancient privilege; English merchant traders, angry with our tariffs; English manufacturers, calling slavery once our damning sin, now forging chains to get a bale of cotton—alike are doomed to grievous disappointment.

They may ignore all comity, may violate the law of nations, may furnish iron-clads and men, may aid by stealth in many ways a subtle course can always set on foot, may catch at points, and in our darkest day may seek to pick a quarrel with us; but all these steps are sure to end in utter, total failure.

The Emperor of France may plant an empire on our borders, may seek to meddle on the golden coast, may lend his dock-yards for the use of pirates, but that will not avail. His movement is a costly one already; has cost him many men and francs, and in the end will cost him many more. He will find he has enough to do to build a throne in Mexico; it seems to be no less a task to find an emperor.

We have no cause to fear. The day of fear has passed, if ever it existed. The nation now is fully used to war. Too many men have nobly served in camps, on battle-fields, in armored ships, to yield the matter now. They are sure to meet whatever comes, and meet it as they may.

But no such strife will come. There is a throbbing of sympathy abroad. Russia is our friend. Imperial Russia sends us words of comfort. She is our ancient ally. She sympathizes with our struggle. She is awake to honor and the issues of the day. Absolute herself, she liberates her serfs. She will not aid to keep the chain on limbs now struggling to be free.

Nay, more; the feeling of the mass abroad is also in our favor. It is so in Britain. It is so on the Continent. The vast, great, middle classes, the men of toil and industry, hold up their hands for us and wish us all success. The struggle is a strife of classes—a part of one great whole—involves the freedom of the masses, the cause of human progress; and yet how strange it is that some are found at home who, fleeing from despotic rule, unite in sympathy with those whose object is to keep them always down!

But one thing more is needed. The Army must be filled; filled up with earnest men. Each one who can must enter the service. Let all the ranks be filled; let volunteering and the draft go on; let three hundred regiments renew the spring campaign, and many months will not elapse before this fungus state, whose corner-stone and boast is slavery, will cease forever from the earth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, to refer so much of the President's message as has been indicated by him, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 15) to provide for the printing annually of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 15) to provide for the printing annually of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees upon the vote on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL.]

The list of absentees was called, and the result announced—yeas 20, nays 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote shows the Senate to be without a quorum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move an adjournment. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of the last day's session, December 23, was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House additional testimony in the following contested-election cases, namely:

J. H. McHenry vs. George H. Yeaman, second district of Kentucky; J. B. S. Todd vs. William Jayne, Dakota Territory; and James Lindsay vs. John G. Scott, third district of Missouri.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary. Also, a message notifying the House that he had approved and signed joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties due to volunteers; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill and zeal in the discharge of his duties.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER. The first business is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. COX. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to submit a resolution of no partisan character, but in reference to the exchange of prisoners. I ask that it be read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the House be counted to see whether we have a quorum present.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope there will be no objection to the introduction of resolutions.

Mr. COX. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his objection. He would not object if he received, as I do daily, letters from men who are suffering as prisoners of war.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is the third resolution that has been introduced on this subject.

Mr. COX. Yes; and I voted for the resolution introduced by myself in the first place.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw it.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will hear the resolution read, I think he will not object to it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I insist upon a count of the House.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I withdraw my call for a count.

DEPARTMENT OF OHIO, ETC.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the department of the Ohio, or the department of Kentucky, their pay, bounty, and pension; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE OLD HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MORRILL asked unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution requesting the Committee on Public Buildings to examine and report as to the expediency of setting apart the old hall of the House of Representatives as a hall for statutory; and also as to the cost of a new flooring and bronze railing on each side of the passage-way through the hall, for the reception of such works of art.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object; and the reason is that I propose to introduce a resolution to remove the seat of Government from this barren and isolated country at the earliest moment.

THREE HUNDRED DOLLARS BOUNTY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, recommending that the law of Congress, approved December 23, 1863, in reference to the pay of bounties to veteran volunteers, be so amended as to allow the bounties to be paid as they now are at least until the ensuing 1st day of February; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIMS BETWEEN PERU AND UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a copy of the report to the Secretary of State of the commissioners on the part of the United States, under the convention with Peru of the 12th of January last, on the subject of claims; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PAYMENTS TO RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have sought opportunity to obtain some information from the War Department heretofore; and I ask leave now to offer the following resolution, to which I trust there will be no objection:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House whether any payments have been made to either of the following-named railroad companies, namely: the Illinois Central Railroad Company, the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company, or the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, for transporting property or troops of the United States since the 25th day of February, 1862, and if any such payments have been made, the amount paid to each company; and also the amount paid to each of said companies prior to the above date, and the basis on which said payments have been made; and that he also inform the House why payments have been made to said companies in disregard of their obligation to transport property and troops of the United States "free of toll or other charge whatsoever."

Mr. GRINNELL. I object.

INTERNAL REVENUE REPORT.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That six thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the accompanying tables, of which one thousand copies shall be for the use of the Internal Revenue office, be printed.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. CRAVENS asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill at the earliest possible day making appropriation to pay the $100 bounty to non-commissioned officers, privates, and other persons, who have been discharged from the Army of the United States within two years from the date of their enlistment by reason of wounds received in battle, as authorized by the act approved the 3d of March, 1863.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Indiana will find that our appropriations cover all that matter.

Mr. CRAVENS. I was not aware of that fact. If that is so, I am satisfied, and will withdraw the resolution.

CALL OF COMMITTEES FOR REPORTS.

Mr. CHANLER asked leave to introduce a resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports; when no reports were made.

The business next in order was the call of States for resolutions in the reversed order, beginning, where the call was last suspended, with the State of Pennsylvania.

JAY COOKE AND COMPANY.

Mr. COFFROTH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to this House what have been the services of Jay Cooke & Co. to the Government in the sale of Government securities, and what has been the rate and the whole amount of compensation therefor. Also, whether said services might not have been as successfully performed by the Treasury Department itself. Also, what sums of money, if any, have been paid out of the Treasury for advertisements ordered by Jay Cooke & Co.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules, the resolution, being a call for information, will have to lie over one day if objected to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let it pass. There being no objection to the resolution, it was considered and agreed to.

THE DUTY ON COAL.

Mr. CHANLER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be and are hereby instructed to report to this House a bill amending the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and pay interest on the public debt," so as to reduce the duty on all mineral coals from three and a half cents to one and a half cents per ton.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that resolution imperative?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend it so as to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act.

Mr. STEVENS. If that amendment is agreed to, I will not object to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

THE WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. FENTON offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the annual report of the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct be printed for the use of the aqueduct office.

DUTIES ON COAL AND ENVELOPES.

Mr. NELSON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to repeal the duties now imposed by law on the importation of coal and paper envelopes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, with authority to examine into the expediency of the establishment of a new route for postal and other purposes between New York and Washington, to whom shall be referred all petitions and papers on that subject, and who shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The House divided on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 50, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Rather than adjourn the House for want of a quorum, I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will hold on to his resolution. There is evidently no quorum here to do business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well; I will insist on it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for tellers on seconding the previous question. Perhaps there is a quorum here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the Speaker count the House, and ascertain if there is a quorum here.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. All I desire is to ascertain whether there is a quorum in the House. If the Speaker will count the House and ascertain that fact, I will withdraw my motion for a call.

The SPEAKER. That object can be attained quite as easily by a call of the roll as by the Speaker counting the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Ashley, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dennison, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Bekley, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kabbelfisch, Orlando Kelllogg, Kernan, Lazarus, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Lovejoy, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Noble, Norton, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perlman, Perry, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schebeck, Seefeldt, Scott, Sloan, Starr, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood.

The names of the absentees having been called over, the Speaker stated that the doors would now be closed, and the names of the absentees would be called for excuses.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to suspend all further proceedings in the call, for the reason that there is now practically no communication between this city and the North, and I think that is a sufficient excuse for the absentees. I was myself sixty hours coming from New York to this city, making about four miles an hour.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WINDOM's motion was agreed to, and all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. There is not; only eighty-six members have answered to their names.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter to one o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

By a joint resolution of your honorable bodies, approved December 23, 1863, the paying of bounties to veteran volunteers, as now practiced by the War Department, is, to the extent of $300 in each case, prohibited after the 5th of the present month. I transmit, for your consideration, a communication from the Secretary of War, accompanied by one from the Provost Marshal General to him, both relating to the subject above mentioned.

I earnestly recommend that the law be so modified as to allow bounties to be paid as they now are at least until the ensuing last day of February.

I am not without anxiety lest I appear to be importunate in thus recalling your attention to a subject upon which you have so recently acted; and nothing but a deep conviction that the public interest demands it could induce me to incur the hazard of being misunderstood on this point. The executive approval was given by me to the resolution mentioned, and it is now by a closer attention and a fuller knowledge of facts that I feel constrained to recommend a reconsideration of the subject.

January 4, 1864.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the report to the Secretary of State of the commissioners on the part of the United States, under the convention with Peru of the 12th of January last, on the subject of claims; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of mail route agents on railroads running through New England, praying for the passage of an act requiring that all letters offered to a route agent for mailing be prepaid by stamps at double rates, and authorizing route agents to carry into the offices at the end of their routes all letters reaching them for mailing which have not such double prepayment, there to be rated at double rates on the excess unpaid; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of J. R. Fairchild, and other mail route agents, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends within the limits of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting, embracing Maryland, Virginia, and the adjacent parts of Pennsylvania, praying that they may be exempted from performing military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of Mrs. Susan W. Harris, the wife of Mr. Arnold Harris, stating that she was the owner, in her own right, of four or five slaves in this District; that she made her claim before the board of commissioners appointed under the act of Congress to settle claims for slaves emancipated in the District; that her claim was disallowed on the ground of the alleged disloyalty of her husband; and she prays that an act may be passed allowing her the sum which the commissioners would have awarded but for that fact. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of R. H. Brigham, and others, citizens of Castine, Maine, praying for a uniform ambulance and hospital system throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends in the State of New York, praying for exemption from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of the American Shipmasters' Association, praying that the Government of the United States furnish to their seamen hydrographic books and charts, at the cost of paper and printing, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in relation to the claim of Henry A. Brigham be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON. The same committee have directed me to report a joint resolution (S. No. 9) to extend the time for paying bounties to veteran and other volunteers. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the resolution considered at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer that it should go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. Let it be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its being printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution cannot be considered to-day, under the rules. It will be printed, as a matter of course. The joint resolution will now receive its first reading.

The joint resolution (S. No. 9) to extend the time for paying bounties to veteran and other volunteers was read a first time by its title.

Mr. FOOT. Let it be read at length.

The Secretary read the resolution. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to extend, from the 5th day of January to the 5th day of February, 1864, the time of paying, in such installments as he may determine, the following bounties: to veterans who have been in the military service of the United States for nine months and have been honorably discharged, and to those veterans in service under enlistment for three or more years who may reenlist for three years or during the war in the companies or regiments to which they belong, and who may have at the time of such reenlistment less than one year to serve, $400 each; to other persons who may voluntarily enlist in the regular or volunteer service of the United States for the term of three years or during the war, and who may be accepted for such service, $300 each.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARDING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 38) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of A. Bush, late public printer for the Territory of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONFISCATION ACT.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to consider the propriety of repealing the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, relative to the construction of the confiscation act, and particularly so much of said joint resolution as purports to prohibit a forfeiture of real estate beyond the natural life of the offender.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMMITTEE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a Committee on the Pacific Railroad—the standing committee that was ordered just before the recess.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will prepare themselves with ballots.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to dispense with the rule which requires the election of standing committees to be by ballot, and that this committee be elected by nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to suspend the rule requiring the election to be by ballot. The Chair hears no objection, and that course will be pursued.

Mr. ANTHONY. I nominate the following Senators to compose the committee: Mr. HOWARD, chairman; Mr. COLLAMER, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HARLAN, Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. BROWN.

The nominations were agreed to.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. FOOT. Some days ago I introduced a bill (S. No. 11) granting lands to the People's Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraphic line to the Pacific coast by the northern route, which has been lying on the table pending the appointment of this committee. I now move that it be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

STEAMER NIAGARA.

Mr. MORRILL. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether the steamer Niagara, chartered by the quartermaster's department in 1853, and reported by a committee of the Senate unfit for the service, has since been purchased for the Government, and if so, when, by whom, and for what price, and whether any claim is made for the original charter, and if so, what, and particularly what is the situation of the claim.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not rise to oppose the adoption of the resolution. I know something about this steamship Niagara, and I think it exceedingly important that the resolution should be adopted, and that it should be adopted at once. But, sir, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on Finance of the Senate to what I think is a most extraordinary decision that has been made by one of the Cabinet officers of this Government, and which may have a very important bearing upon this case. I find it stated in the summary of news in the Globe, which generally is very correct as well as succinct in its statements, that

"The Attorney General has lately decided that where an allowance has been made by any Cabinet officer, and the money paid over accordingly, it is not competent for the Comptroller to disallow it in the accounts of disbursing officers, upon the supposition on his part that there is want of authority of law for the payment in question."

If it be true that such a decision has been made by the Attorney General, I suppose the reason of the rule would extend to an order to pay made by a Cabinet officer as well as to the actual payment of money; and if that is to be the rule hereafter, I see not otherwise than that the Treasury of the whole Government of the United States is in the control of the Cabinet officers of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Any one of them.

Mr. GRIMES. Any one of the Cabinet officers of the Government. I do not know whether this decision has been made; I find it here recorded in the Globe; and I merely rose for the purpose of calling the particular attention of the Committee on Finance to the importance of looking into it, because it is a question which may and does very intimately connect itself with the resolution that has just been submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The resolution was adopted.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday is the motion to refer the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States, introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] to the Committee on the Judiciary; and upon that question the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, it seemed to be the impression on the part of some gentlemen yesterday that any Senator who introduced a bill was entitled, as a matter of courtesy, to have it referred to any committee he saw fit to designate. Such has not been the rule since I have been a member of this body. There has always been an unwritten law, a common law of this body, as there is of all other bodies, which defines with a great deal of particularity the character of bills that shall be referred to each particular committee; and I very well remember, during the time the party of which the Senator from Kentucky was a member had the ascendancy in this body, that the Senate was divided several times as to the committee to which particular bills should be referred.

The distinction in regard to the reference of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs or to the Committee on the Judiciary is this: this bill relates to the personnel of the military service; it relates to these men as officers of the military service; it does not relate to them in their character as private citizens. If it did, it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Judiciary Committee has referred to it every bill which defines a crime that can be committed by any citizen outside of the particular profession to which he is recognized as belonging. But if we want to pass a bill of pains and penalties in regard to the military or naval service, we do not think of referring it to the Judiciary Committee to define the character of those penalties. If we want to establish new rules and articles of war, we do not think of referring it to the Judiciary Committee, but to the Military Committee.

Now, what is the character of the bill which is proposed by the Senator from Kentucky? It is to prohibit, as he says, military officers, not as individuals, but in their character as military officers, from interfering with or mingling in elections in the States. I have this remark to make in regard to that, which it seems to me is conclusive: if these men interfere with the elections as private individuals, they are amenable to the laws of the States where they perpetrate the offense; but if they interfere with them as military men, they should be amenable as military men before a military tribunal. They may act in obedience to the mandate of a superior military authority. That superior military authority may not be recognized by the judicial tribunal before which the Senator's bill may send them. I cannot conceive of a wider departure from the rules that have hitherto been enforced in regard to the reference of bills in the Senate than this would be, if this bill should be taken from the Committee on Military Affairs and sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a matter that relates solely to the officers of the Army as officers of the Army, and not as individuals—relating to the personnel of the service. If it related to the general affairs of the country, I admit it should properly be sent to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, it is manifest to my mind that this bill should go to the Judiciary Committee. The object of the bill is to protect the purity and the freedom of the elective franchise. It prescribes punishments for certain persons engaged in the public service who shall in any way interfere with the freedom of election. The Senator from Iowa says that those persons ought to be tried before military tribunals. While I had this bill under consideration, I looked well to that point, and, on due reflection, I was clearly of opinion that in order to effect the object desired, we should try these persons for this infraction of the rights of the voter before the civil tribunals of the country.

It strikes me that all bills the object of which is to prescribe, define, or provide punishment for crime should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. This bill, if it shall become a law, will not punish these persons by courts-martial, but will subject them to indictment and punishment in the civil courts, where, in my judgment, the jurisdiction should be vested. The evil sought to be remedied by this bill is one of startling import. We know, sir, that elections have been carried in States of this Union at the point of the bayonet against the will of a majority of qualified voters of States and of districts, and I have been amazed to find that we have no law upon our statute-book punishing a soldier for interfering in elections. Under the laws of Great Britain, the harshest penalties are prescribed against persons for such offenses, and they are punished in the civil courts of that kingdom. If I am not mistaken, bribery and all such interference with elections was by the common law a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment, after indictment and conviction in the courts of law. The penal statutes of that country prescribe heavy penalties against those who interfere in elections. In order that the Senate may see the character of the bill before the vote is taken, I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be read. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

A bill to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men within one mile of the place where any general or special election is held in any State of the United States of America. And that it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State of the United States of America, or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election in any State, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State of the United States. Any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who violates this section of this act, shall, for every such offense, be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not less than $300, and not exceeding $30,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than two years, nor more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court trying the same; and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified, according to the laws of the State in which he shall offer to vote.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer or person in the military or naval service of the United States who shall order or advise, or who shall directly or indirectly, by force, threat, menace, intimidation, or otherwise, prevent or attempt to prevent any qualified voter of any State of the United States of America from freely exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election in any State of the United States, or who shall in like manner compel, or attempt to compel, any officer of an election in any such State to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified to vote, or who shall impose or attempt to impose any rules or regulations for conducting such election different from those prescribed by law, or interfere in any manner with any officer of said election in the discharge of his duties, shall for every such offense be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $20,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, it is apparent from the reading of this bill that the object is to punish in the civil courts certain offenses which may be committed against the freedom of election. It has nothing to do with courts-martial. I think it must be evident to all that the Judiciary Committee is the proper committee to which the bill should go.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, let me illustrate to the Senator from Kentucky what his bill proposes to do. It declares that it shall be a penal offense against the laws of the United States for any troops to be kept within one mile of any voting place. An officer in command of a regiment, a colonel, a major, or a captain, is commanded by his superior officer to occupy a post in the city of Baltimore. The Senator's bill would render that captain, or major, or colonel who obeyed the command of his superior officer amenable to the law, if this bill should be enacted into a law, and liable to be incarcerated in the penitentiary and forever disqualified from holding any office of honor or profit, civil or military.

Mr. POWELL. It is true that is the penalty prescribed; but that is by no means unusual in free Governments. If the Senator will look to a statute passed during the reign of George II, he will find that all soldiers quartered in any city, borough, or town are to be removed from their camps or barracks, at every election of a member of Parliament, two miles from the place of voting. That was the law of our English ancestors. But, sir, if a superior officer should give the order referred to, in violation of the law, if this bill should become a law, that superior officer would be subject to indictment and punishment by fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary, and be ever afterwards ineligible to hold an office of honor or profit under this Government. It was made so intentionally. It would not be the officer who executed the command alone, but the officer who gave the command, who would be punished under this bill, and it is proper that he should be punished. So far, then, as the Senator's remark is concerned, it seems to me to have no weight whatever. Yes, sir, if the General-in-Chief of the Army were to give such an order, if this bill be passed, that General-in-Chief would be punished by fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary, and he would richly deserve to be so punished. The object of the bill is to have freedom of election, not only in theory but in fact. I can tell the Senator that unless we have freedom of election we have not free Government. We must have free speech, a free press, and freedom of elections, or we shall not maintain the liberties of the people.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not consider that the merits of the bill are now open for debate. I concede the principle laid down by the Senator from Iowa in his first remarks, that in matters of general and public interest it does not come within the scope of the courtesy of the Senate to refer a subject or a bill of such a character merely according to the wishes of the person who introduces it. According to my observation of parliamentary usage and courtesy, where there is a particular and a peculiar subject that requires a special investigation, it is usual and courteous to refer such a subject to its friends, and not to a step-mother, to use a phrase that is sometimes heard in relation to parliamentary proceedings. I agree, then, that the position taken by the Senator from Iowa is correct, that in regard to a matter of this character, or any other matter of general, public, national interest, no rule of courtesy requires that such a measure shall be referred merely according to the wishes of the Senator who may introduce it.

The question here, then, is one of propriety as to which committee this bill shall be referred to, the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on the Judiciary. I concede that if the bill related to the ordinary military duties of officers or soldiers in the Army, the appropriate reference would be to the Committee on Military Affairs; but this is a bill which introduces topics of a totally different character. The question here is whether certain acts when performed by military men, officers or privates, shall be a civil offense or not. What does the bill introduced by my colleague propose to do? Not to regulate the duties of the soldiery, but to prevent a perversion of the duties of the soldiery, to prevent the action and interference of the soldiery from being brought into conflict with the freedom of suffrage and with the purity and independence of the Government. That, sir, is the object of the bill. It proposes to declare that when there is a certain line of conduct adopted by the soldiery in relation to freedom of elections, those acts shall constitute a penal civil offense, not a military offense, not an offense to be tried by martial law, if there is such a law, and there is no such law in this country or in England. But the object of the bill is to declare that certain acts on the part of the military of the country, if done, shall constitute a civil offense to be tried in civil courts, according to a law of Congress that is now proposed to be passed.

Sir, there could not be a more appropriate subject for reference to the Judiciary Committee. What has the Judiciary Committee cognizance of properly? It is the general subject of the laws of Congress. Now, where there is a bill or a proposition to create a new penal offense, and to impose grievous punishment upon that offense, what so proper, what so reasonable, as that such a bill should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, to receive its consideration and its mature investigation? I am at a loss to conceive how there can be any objection to the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee on account of its inappropriateness. It would certainly be inappropriate to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, I think, although it does relate to the military. If a bill were introduced in reference to the sailors, the marines, or the civil officers of the United States Government in any of its departments, and there was a proposition to make any conduct on their part a civil offense, and to punish it by law in civil courts, it ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, whether it related to one class of public employes or another, or to private citizens.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDRICKS, (when Mr. HENDERSON's name was called.) I am desired by the Senator from Missouri to say that he is detained from the Senate Chamber by sickness.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, (when his name was called.) Mr. President, I shall vote to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, believing that the proper committee—

The VICE PRESIDENT. No debate is now in order.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Then I shall simply vote yea.

The calling of the roll being concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Willey—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilson—21.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is disagreed to; and the question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I will state now what I intended to say before. I voted for the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee, believing that the subject-matter is one which belongs properly to that committee, and not for the reasons assigned by the Senator from Kentucky, for I have seen nothing to induce me to believe that there has been any improper interference with elections upon the part of the military. I think they have guaranteed the full and free right of suffrage to every loyal man who had a right to vote, and have only prevented the voting of traitors and rebel sympathizers, whose votes could not advance the public interest in any State or district.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, as the Senator from Indiana has taken occasion to express his opinions as to the propriety of the interference of the military with the freedom of elections in the States—

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Senator will pardon me; I do not admit any such thing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, then, since the Senator has chosen to deny that there has been any impropriety on the part of the military in their interference with the freedom of elections in the States, I cannot sit quietly as a Senator from what was once a State of the American Union, and the first to adopt the Constitution under which we live, without saying to that Senator that I have seen the armed soldiery (acting under the command, I suppose, of "the powers that be") appear at the polls at which I myself had a right, according to the constitution and laws of my State, to vote, and there, by positive interference, drive men from the polls, take some men who had done naught in violation of the law of the land either Federal or State, and incarcerate them in the county prison; and no longer ago, sir, than last November, in the county in which I live, as soon as the voters arrived on the ground, before they had offered to vote, before they had approached the polls, the soldiery seized them, fastened them up, and kept them confined.

Sir, a majority of the legal voters of the State of Delaware were, during the last special election in our State—an election called to fill a vacancy which had occurred in the other branch of Congress—disfranchised, not allowed to cast their votes in that State; and why? Because a majority of the legal voters of that State did not approve of the action of this Administration. But, says the Senator, nobody has been interfered with by the military power of this country in reference to his right to vote, who was not either a rebel or a rebel sympathizer. Sir, I mean no disrespect to that Senator, for I know the kindness of his heart, but such expressions have become so common that they can have no weight, even when uttered by a Senator.

Take my own State. From the commencement of these unfortunate troubles, in which brother is found arrayed against brother, has there been any attempt in that State, by any political organization, or even by a mob, even by two persons united together, to violate any law of this Government, to give any aid or encouragement, by act or deed, to those who are in revolt against the Government? I defy that Senator, or any other Senator on this floor, to show where any attempt has been made by any political organization in that State to tear down the fabric of this once proud and glorious Union. No such effort has been made; and yet, sir, the party in power finding, before the last special election in that State, that they could not send a Representative to the other branch of Congress, a fellow, formerly living in a neighboring State to that in which the Senator resides, clothed with a little military brief authority, publishes an order that no citizen of that State should be allowed to vote unless he would take such an oath as his almightiness should prescribe. The brave hero of the blood-stained battlefield of Vienna, the hero of military operations in a railroad car, makes his will the supreme law of a sovereign State, and says to the majority of the legal voters, "You shall not vote at the election in your State for a Representative in Congress, though you have every qualification prescribed by the Constitution and laws, unless you become a humble servant of the military hero of the blood-stained field of Vienna." And, sir, to execute his order, what does he do? He sends his military forces to every election poll in the State; he has them stationed there, his order posted up, his men at the polls advertised beforehand what they must do, and a sovereign State becomes a plaything in the hands of an epauletted officer who has never illustrated his devotion to the good of his country by any great heroic achievements, but who, "clothed with a little brief authority," has "played such fantastic tricks before high Heaven" as, if they have not "made angels weep," have made good citizens mourn. And at the previous election in my State, I, sir, had to vote under crossed bayonets; soldiers were stationed at the polls, and at some of the voting places at that election peaceable citizens were assaulted by your soldiery. At one of the voting places the judges of the election, who declined to take the vote of an unnaturalized foreigner, who, according to the constitution and laws of our State, had not a right to vote, were threatened that if they did not take that vote the ballot-box should be broken; and the vote was taken. This whole subject has been investigated by a committee of the Legislature of our State, and if the gentleman will take the trouble to look through the pages of their report, he will find innumerable instances of such unlawful acts.

The Senator says there has been no interference except where there have been rebels or rebel sympathizers. Mr. President, is it not somewhat singular, somewhat strange, that the entire members of one political party in one of the States of this Union should all be rebels or rebel sympathizers, no patriot to be found in their midst, no person who loves his country, or cherishes the institutions of that country, to be found within that political organization; and that all the patriots, all the gentlemen who cherish a fondness for the institutions of their fathers, are found to be members of the opposite political organization? But the Senator and others may say, "You could have had the privilege of voting if you had gone forward and taken the oath prescribed by this military officer." Not so, sir. If every member of the political organization to which I belong, and to which I am proud to belong, had gone and offered to deposit his vote, and professed himself willing to take that prescribed oath, still, the design, the purpose, for which that military was sent to our polls being to carry the election by this Administration, they would not have allowed—I am justified in saying that they would not have allowed a sufficient number of the members of that party to vote to defeat their cherished object. Why do I say so? I say so, sir, because it had a practical test at the last election. I refer now to a fact capable of the clearest proof, that in one of the hundreds in the county in which I live, and at one of the voting places, the opposition, not knowing that the members of the Democratic party did not intend to vote, but supposing that they would offer their votes, as soon as they arrived on the ground had numbers of them arrested.

I am proud to say, sir, that the majority of the legal voters of my State, not choosing to have any conflict with the national authorities, choosing rather to be disfranchised than to have their soil stained with blood, or to give the pretext to this Administration to say that they were not peaceable, law-abiding citizens, refrained from voting, and throughout the whole State there were but twelve or fourteen votes cast for the Democratic candidate. But suppose, sir, they could have had a right to vote, suppose they had been allowed to vote by taking the oath prescribed, what right has any military officer in a State not in revolt, in a State where there has been no attempt at revolution, in a State where no political organization has ever avowed any hostility to the Union, to step in and say, "You, you, the proud citizen of a State and of the United States shall hold from me your right of voting for a member to represent you in Congress, or (as at the election before) for members to represent you in your own State Legislature; you shall have a right to vote, if you do my bidding and swear to what I shall dictate to you?"

Sir, I did not vote at the last election in my State, and I would never vote again if I had to vote either as the military, or as an Administration, or as any man might dictate. When the exercise of the right of suffrage ceases to be free, I do not wish to go through the mockery of attempting to exercise it.

But, sir, I will give the Senator from Indiana another proof of interference. About a week before the election recently held in Maryland, I passed through two of the lower counties of the first congressional district of that State, and was in the town where resides the Honorable Mr. Crisfield, who during the last Congress represented his district in the House of Representatives, and who this last fall was a candidate for reelection. I believe that he was the regular nominee of what was called the Union party; but another candidate—and I shall say nothing against that gentleman, certainly, for I have no unkind feelings toward him—was brought out in opposition, whose views it was supposed accorded more with those of the Administration, although Mr. Crisfield, when representing his district in Congress, was universally conceded to be a perfectly loyal and good Union man. But, sir, on the day of the election in his district, the military were placed, I believe, at every poll in those counties, and gentlemen were denied the privilege of voting, even Mr. Crisfield himself, unless he would take an oath prescribed by the military authorities, because it was more desirable to elect another gentleman in his place. The Senator from Indiana may say that this is no interference by the military; but if he will take up the papers published at the time and read the evidence disclosed in that case, he will find that as the citizen went to vote for Mr. Crisfield in that district, even when he offered to take the oath, that was not sufficient without his being questioned by a military officer who stood at the polls, to know whether his political views and opinions accorded with those of that officer, acting, I suppose, according to instructions which he had received. If that be not interference, if that be not unjust interference, I know not what would be. Interference, I presume, is not confined to bodily seizing hold of a man and dragging him from the polls. Any act of intimidation, any restraint placed on the free exercise of the right of suffrage, is an interference. Why, sir, yesterday, while I was listening to the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN EYCK,] in his opening remarks, in which I understood him to dissent from some views expressed by the President in his proclamation or in his message, I began to feel a little serious as to what would be his condition, for I saw, directly after that proclamation and that message appeared, that some of the Administration papers—and one in this town—made conformity to the views of that message a test of loyalty.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senator for a moment, he having made reference to what occurred yesterday; and I do it because the matter is personal to myself.

I see in a New York paper, the Evening Post, a reference to my few remarks, as follows:

"Mr. TEN EYCK moved that so much of President Lincoln's message as refers to his plan for reconstruction be referred to the Judiciary Committee. Mr. TEN EYCK then addressed the Senate at length in opposition to Mr. Lincoln's plan."

A reference to the Globe will show what I did say. After referring to the constitutional question, and submitting remarks upon that subject, I added:

"The President, with practical-good sense, has, in his message and accompanying proclamation, 'hit the nail upon the head,' and opened up a way. There needs no new creation. Destroy the rebel arms, the contracting forces. Drive armed insurgents from the rebel States. Let loyal men assert their former rights. The Government is theirs. Let them proceed to organize; let them revive suspended government, and let us here, with all our powers, protect them in the movement. This will solve the question; this will meet the issue. The plan proposed by the Executive is wise and just, far-reaching, statesmanlike, and patriotic. It is a sound and good suggestion, and should be regarded. It is hard to see how any other course could even be adopted. It just suits a State where treason has been crushed. It is an easy, quiet mode, free from shock and strife, dispute and controversy; it 'sets the ball in motion,' reanimates suspended life, and starts the State anew upon the road to greatness."

Yet, sir, the reporters in the gallery have stated what is directly the reverse as having fallen from me. I do not expect to have the few remarks I submit here reported at length; but I have a right to expect that I shall not be flatly misrepresented. I may have been unfortunate in not making myself understood; but if I understood myself or knew my motive, it was to speak in support of the Executive and the Administration, and not to oppose it or array myself against it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the gentleman will take it kindly when I say that I do not suppose there is any danger of his being removed from the orthodox political church, orthodoxy being determined, however, on presidential views.

But, sir, I will not extend these remarks in reference to military interference. Perhaps I have already extended them too long. I should not have said a word had it not been for the remark of the Senator from Indiana, that he knew of no instance where this had been done, or that, where there had been any interference, it was only to prevent traitors and sympathizers with treason from voting.

In conclusion, I will suggest in all kindness that in discussing questions of this sort, it is more kind, to say the least of it, to admit that there is room for honest difference of opinion between members of the different political organizations, than to claim for one the possession of all the spirit of patriotism, and all the love of country, and to attribute to the members of all other political organizations contrary feelings and motives.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, the very few remarks I made seem to have had a very unfortunate effect. This is a question simply of reference, whether this bill shall now be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senate having decided not to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. My vote being given in favor of that proposition, I stated simply, in one sentence, the reason why I voted for that reference, and why I found myself differing from friends and Senators, for whose opinions I have the utmost respect, believing that the question properly belonged to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I shall not be drawn into any discussion on the merits of this bill until a report shall have been made, and until the subject is properly before the Senate. I made no asseveration on this subject—none whatever—except this, that I had seen no evidence convincing me of any improper interference with elections on the part of the military. I am not so familiar with the scenes which transpired either in the State of Delaware or Maryland, at their recent elections, as the Senator doubtless is, and of course raise no question with him on that subject. I only remarked that I had seen no evidence to satisfy me that there had been any improper interference; nor do I believe that the order of General Schenck, so much decried, was such an improper interference with elections as characterized by the Senator from Delaware.

The Senator from Delaware was somewhat mistaken in geography, if not in his recollection of this interference, for at no time did General Schenck reside in my State.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I said a State near the State represented by the Senator.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That is true; a State of which I and my whole State are justly proud—the great Commonwealth of Ohio.

The order issued by General Schenck, as I understand it, was just this: in voting in the State of Delaware, the voter was required to swear that he had not given aid and comfort to the enemy during the rebellion, and, perhaps, that he would not give such aid and comfort; I am not sure in reference to that. Will the honorable Senator inform me if that was substantially the character of the order?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a copy of the order at my room, but have not got it here. It was a lengthy oath, and I cannot remember all that was in it. The Senator will observe that the point of my objection is not so much to what was in the oath, as the attempt by military interference to undertake to prescribe the qualifications of voters.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I understand, then, the true objection is not to the substance of the oath, but that any such test oath was required at all. Now, I will ask the Senator from Delaware this question: suppose a citizen of Delaware, or Maryland, had gone into the service of the rebellion, had fought for one or two years in the ranks of the rebels, and had returned to Delaware, and, under their constitution, was a legal voter, was there any power, except this order, to exclude his vote?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will answer the Senator with pleasure. He would not be a legal voter under the constitution of the State of Delaware, because, if he had gone into the territories of any Power, either real or assumed, independent of the Government to which the United States belonged, he would have lost his domicile, and would not have been a legal voter under our constitution and laws.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If I understand the question of residence, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and by all the local courts having jurisdiction and cognizance of that question, they decided this: that a mere temporary absence, with no intention to change the residence, never does change the residence or the domicile; and I suppose that under that decision a service of eighteen months or two years in the rebel army would not change the residence of a citizen of Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator is mistaken. Even with a floating intention of returning to the State, he still is not, under our laws, entitled to vote. But the point I make is this: the party going into rebellion goes there claiming it to be a distinct and independent country. He leaves his State and joins what he says is a different government from that to which he belongs under our law. Were I sitting as the judge of the election I would not take his vote with my interpretation of the law of the State.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Then, with that peculiar provision of the constitution of Delaware, with which I was not familiar and to the construction of which I do not assent, I will ask the gentleman if the same provision applies to the States of Kentucky and Maryland? I am somewhat familiar with the constitution of Kentucky, and I think no such test as that is applied to their voters, but the simple question is one of residence; and that is a question of intention, and intention alone. No temporary absence, however prolonged, will ever destroy the residence of a citizen, either in Maryland or Kentucky, if I understand their constitutions aright. If there is no provision under the laws of Maryland or Kentucky on the subject—for I leave Delaware out of the question with that construction of her constitution—I ask if there is any means by which a rebel soldier, having served in the rebel army, could be denied his vote at an election in either of those States?

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I will speak for Kentucky. While I am up I will make a single remark, with the permission of the Senator, not intending to discuss this bill at present. So far as the constitutional question put by the Senator is concerned, there is no provision in the constitution of Kentucky by which a man will lose his residence for any temporary absence whatever. Our constitution, which is the fundamental law, prescribes the qualifications of a voter in all cases. If he has lived in the State of Kentucky two years, or in the county one year, and sixty days in the election precinct, he is entitled to vote there. That is the provision of the constitution of Kentucky on the subject. He must claim and prove that to be his home, and then he can vote.

But I will inform my friend from Indiana that at the session before the last, at all events since the war broke out, in 1861, I think, the Legislature of Kentucky passed a law by which they authorized the judges of the election, on a voter being challenged by anybody, to administer an oath to him that he had not borne arms against the Government of the United States and had not given aid and comfort to the rebellion. He had to swear that he had not done either of these things before he was qualified to vote. That is the law as it stands to-day. I give it substantially. I do not pretend to quote the words.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of my colleague I will add another provision, which he has forgotten, to that law. The law makes the joining of the rebel army or of the rebel Government a forfeiture of the right of suffrage.

Mr. POWELL. That is correct. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into the merits of this bill. I feel deeply indebted to my friend from Indiana for the courtesy that he has extended to me in voting to give it the reference I desired. There is no Senator on this floor for whom I have a higher personal regard. He is never wanting in courtesy and civility toward a Senator, no matter on which side of the Chamber he may sit. But on this occasion he was governed by another reason: that the subject-matter of this bill was of such a nature that the Judiciary Committee was the proper one to which it should be referred. However, I have been outvoted in that matter, and do not care very much about it. Still, with great deference to my brother Senators, I must say, I think their decision wrong. I know it is irrevocable, and that I have to submit to it, and I am going to do it without any growling about it.

But I thought my friend from Indiana, in the remarks he made, tried to throw the wet blanket on my bill before it came up for consideration. He says he thinks the soldiers have not interfered in elections. That he thinks so I have no doubt; but I know that he is mistaken. It strikes me that wise men, whether the thing proposed to be prohibited by a law has ever been done or not, would act with circumspection, with prudence, with caution, and with eminent wisdom in passing penal laws to prevent offenses being committed, and to punish persons who commit offenses. I suppose no State in this Union, no civilized Government on the face of the earth, when they framed their penal codes had citizens in their eye who had committed the offenses proposed to be punished. Whether there are any laws on the statute-book on this subject or not is a question that we should look to. If we find there are none, then, as wise lawgivers, the question is, whether we should or should not make such a law. The naked fact that we have had no soldier in the Army of the United States heretofore who has ever interfered in elections is no reason why this law should not be passed. If that practice was common, and they had so interfered, the importance of passing the law would be eminent and immediate. But, sir, a wise people, particularly a people like ours, who are the sovereigns, and where that sovereignty rests upon the ballot-box, should provide against all interference with the freedom of election by officers of the Government; and it is eminently wise that we should pass every law to protect the freedom of suffrage.

But, sir, without regard to the fact whether soldiers interfere in elections or not, we should pass some law like this. I confess I was amazed, when I looked into our statutes, to find no law of Congress on the subject. We have laws there punishing soldiers of the Army of the United States with death for pillaging and plundering, and almost a hundred other things, and prescribing milder punishments for milder offenses; but I could find none on the subject of interfering with elections or the elective franchise. I thought that perhaps the statute-books had been so badly indexed that I was unable to find it, and I asked a celebrated military man if there was such a law. He told me there was none; and hence I have deemed it my duty to introduce such a bill here.

But I can state to my friend from Indiana that if he thinks there has been no military interference with the freedom of elections he is greatly mistaken. I have seen an officer of the gentleman's own State, with the rank of colonel—his name is John W. Foster; for when I assault an individual or censure his conduct I shall give his name—I saw him in the county of Henderson, where I live, arrest two citizens for exercising the right of suffrage, and put them in prison; and he kept them there until the next day, and then they were turned out without any charge being made against them, so far as I was advised. I saw some four or five other persons arrested by this same individual, and carried to headquarters, and there interrogated and allowed to go free—all for the purpose of intimidation.

I will tell my worthy friend that officers of that sixty-fifth regiment of Indiana located at that time in other precincts of that county went and took their pens and struck from the poll-book every Democratic candidate. They would allow no man to cast his vote unless he voted for the other ticket. That ticket of the Democratic party was headed by Mr. Wickliffe, my honorable colleague during the last Congress in the other end of the Capitol, and I never heard anybody accuse him of disunionism.

I will tell the Senator further—and these facts, at the proper time, I will have proved, if necessary, in the Senate, for in a contested election going on in that district the matter has been proved and is now being printed—that in one voting place in that district they sent a chaplain to supervise the election; and he, with his own hand, scratched out the names of certain candidates, and then stood by and himself administered the oath to voters prescribed by the proclamation of the military commander.

These things occurred in the town and county in which I reside. I will tell the worthy Senator, further, that I have in my possession proclamations defining the qualifications of voters, and prescribing oaths to be taken by voters, in the State of Kentucky, issued by military commanders, in conflict with the qualifications and oaths prescribed by the constitution and laws of Kentucky. These interferences should not have taken place; but, as I have before said, even if no interference ever had taken place, I should still hold this to be a wise law. I do not intend to stake the passage of my bill on what has been done. I know it could have no retroactive effect to punish those persons who have violated the law; but I want it held up in terrorem and to punish its violators in all future time. I want the freedom of the press, the freedom of speech, and the freedom of suffrage protected in the country, and, if I could, I would visit with the harshest punishments any officer of this Government who undertook, in any way, to interfere with the freedom of suffrage in any State of this Union. The bill expressly says that a qualified voter must be interfered with to make a person amenable to it. If a person is a rebel, under the laws of Kentucky he is not a qualified voter. I do not desire those who are not qualified to vote at all; neither do I wish those who are entitled to vote to be deprived of that privilege. I believe I shall have the concurrence of my friend from Indiana for the passage of the bill whenever it comes up; for the proof that I have, and will adduce to him, will be such as to cause him to banish from his mind any idea he may have that no interference has taken place.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The remarks of my friend from Kentucky were somewhat prolonged; so much so, that I have almost forgotten the precise question to which I was speaking.

Mr. POWELL. If my friend will allow me, I only intended them as an answer to his remarks.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The question was simply in reference to the constitutional provision as to voters in the State of Kentucky. That, if I understand my distinguished friend, was precisely as I have stated it. In addition to that the Legislature of Kentucky have passed a law disqualifying rebels and rebel sympathizers from voting.

Mr. POWELL. "Aiders and abettors."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. "Aiders and abettors" from voting, and disfranchising them from voting forever. In addition, then, to the constitutional provision the Legislature of Kentucky have done precisely what General Schenck undertook to do by his orders; and I feel that my argument in favor of the order is very much strengthened by showing that the Legislature of Kentucky, not relying upon their constitutional provision, found it necessary to go outside of that and pass an additional law in words and terms precisely equivalent to General Schenck's order; and a very wise legislation it seems to me it was, too.

Mr. POWELL. With the permission of the Senator I will remark that I did not intend to say a word about General Schenck, and have not done it. Let me say, further, that the Legislature of Kentucky certainly had the power to place any qualification not prohibited by the constitution of the State upon the voter. Whether that law of the Legislature of Kentucky is constitutional or not—and I have great doubts on that point; I incline to the opinion that it is not constitutional—certainly General Schenck has no power to prescribe the qualification of a voter in any part of this Union. If General Schenck had been a member of the Legislature of Ohio, his own State, he and his brother members, if not in violation of the constitution of Ohio, could have done it in that State, but he could not do it as a general commanding a department. Has General Schenck a right to go to the proud and noble State of Indiana and prescribe oaths and tests and qualifications to the voters there? If he could not prescribe the qualification of voters in Indiana, he could not in Maryland. That is the point.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have understood, as a lawyer, that the qualification of voters was established by the constitution of a State, not by the Legislature of a State at all. But we will not argue that question.

Mr. POWELL. That will depend upon the action of the constitutional convention.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the State of Indiana, and every other State in the Union, has the right to declare the forfeiture of the right of suffrage upon the commission of crime. I presume that the constitution of the enlightened State of Indiana authorizes that scope of legislative action; ours does; and it is that provision and that power in our constitution which give to our Legislature the right to define crime; and the Legislature having declared that adhesion to the rebel government or joining the rebel arms is a crime which produces the forfeiture of the right of suffrage, that declaration deprives them of it, and authorizes, of course, the judges of elections who exercise quasi judicial functions, to propound the question.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I am not to be drawn into a discussion of the constitutionality of the Kentucky law. I think it a very wise provision, and probably very correct; but when we proposed lately, under the same provision in the Constitution of the United States, to make a test disqualifying disloyal men from becoming members of this body, I heard the power doubted on the floor of the Senate. But I do not rise now to address myself to that subject.

I understood my distinguished friend from Delaware to speak of a certain order issued by a military commander. He did not name any one; but I suppose we all know he alluded to General Schenck, for he was the military commander who issued the order; and inasmuch as the speech of the Senator from Delaware was drawn out by a mere casual remark of mine, and the conduct of General Schenck has been brought into controversy before the Senate, I think it perhaps necessary to say one word in reference to that order, and to the disparaging remark which has been made in reference to General Schenck, "the hero of the bloody battle of Vienna."

Sir, what was the history of that "bloody battle of Vienna?" General Schenck took a portion of his force out to the front, and was waylaid by the rebels, and attacked at Vienna, and some ten or fifteen of his men were killed, and perhaps twenty-five wounded. It was an unfortunate affair where blame properly attached to no one, as I understand it; and I understand that to have been the decision of the military authorities of the country, for shortly after that battle General Schenck, instead of being reprimanded, was promoted and made a major general in the armies of the United States.

My distinguished friend from Delaware has not seen fit to refer to any other military services of General Schenck except that one. Is he not advised of the fact that General Schenck has fought nobly in many battles since? Is he not apprised of the fact that his arm is paralyzed to-day from a wound received on the bloody battle-field of the second Bull Run? Is he not apprised of the further fact that since all these things he has been triumphantly elected to Congress in the Vallandigham district in the State of Ohio, and that he is now one of the most honored members of the other House? I am not here to undertake the idle task of pronouncing a eulogy on General Schenck. If the history of the country is not sufficient praise, any words of mine surely would not add to it; and I only say thus much because incidentally my remarks have been the occasion of this seeming attack upon him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I am not here to make any assault upon General Schenck, or anybody else, for any acts not warranted by facts within my knowledge. If General Schenck has acquired any laurels in this war, I would not detract from them. If he has acquired any fame in this war, I would not lessen that fame. But if, in speaking of his government in his department, I have spoken with some degree of heat, it is because I recollect—and that recollection is fresh in my memory—the gross oppression to which a portion of the people of my State have been unwarrantably subjected by his orders and by his conduct.

One word more, and I have done, for I do not wish unnecessarily to prolong this debate. I will state to the Senator that the evil from these orders results not so much from the making of the orders themselves as from the mode in which they are carried out. A military officer knows very well that, in making these unconstitutional and unwarrantable orders, he intrusts their execution to comparatively irresponsible men, and the grossest oppression has resulted in their execution. I will state one fact to the Senator from Indiana. I know his frankness and his candor, and should like to have his opinion of it. In one of the voting districts of the county in which I live, at the opening of the polls the judge of the election announced that the military had made this order, and that he intended faithfully to execute it, and that he should administer this oath to every voter at that poll. One party in the State did not vote at all. Ninety-five persons appeared and took the oath, and nineteen belonging to the party to which the gentleman belongs refused to take the oath, although prescribed by the military, and offered to be administered by the judge of the election, and thereupon a provost marshal was sent for, who appeared upon the ground and threatened to arrest the judge of election if he administered that oath to those persons. They were, I presume, assumed to be loyal.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I will only detain the Senate one moment further. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to say that Colonel Foster, of Indiana, had been guilty of very many improprieties in conducting the election in Kentucky. I will ask the Senator if Colonel Foster was not then acting under a general order of General Boyle, commanding the department of Kentucky, in carrying out that election?

Mr. POWELL. I do not think General Boyle ever issued any such orders. He may have acted under General Shackleford.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Did not General Boyle issue an order on the subject of elections?

Mr. POWELL. He did issue an order, but not such a one as this.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. And Colonel Foster was proposing to carry it out.

Mr. POWELL. I suppose he was acting under General Shackleford.

Mr. WILSON. The motion is to refer this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am certainly willing that it should go to my committee, if the Senate so order; but I wish distinctly to say, before the vote is taken, that I am opposed to any action whatever on the subject-matter embraced in it. I am opposed to action for the reason that I am in favor of what the Government has done. I shall stand by this action of the Government here, elsewhere, and at all coming times. It is a fact, and we know it, that in the States of Delaware and Maryland there are traitors as bitter and hostile to the Government of the United States as there are in the States of Virginia and South Carolina. They have manifested it on more than one occasion. The Legislature of Delaware passed a series of resolutions that had the taint and odor of moral treason about them. No truly loyal man could have voted for the resolutions that passed that Legislature but a short time ago. These men in Delaware are quite as reluctant to take the oath of allegiance as is the Senator from Delaware not now present [Mr. BAYARD] to take the oath required by the Senate. I am in favor of administering the oath of allegiance to members of the Senate, and of the Government, and of requiring men to swear loyalty to their country. I am in favor of keeping from the ballot-boxes of the country any man who is not willing to take the oath of allegiance to the country in this hour of its trial. We know that in Delaware, in Maryland, in Kentucky, and in Missouri, there are men who, throughout this rebellion, have been for the rebellion, and have been more or less active in the cause of the rebellion.

I justify the action of the Government, and I hope it will continue so to act till the close of the rebellion; for I see plainly that the men who cannot succeed by bloody war, will, when baffled and defeated by our brave soldiers in the field, rush to the ballot-box, hoping there to win what they could not conquer in the field. I hope the policy of the nation will be to require those men, when they approach the ballot-box to take part in the government of the country, to swear before Almighty God fidelity to the country. The Government is false and recreant if it allows a traitor who shrinks from taking such an oath to put a vote in the ballot-box. I happen to know something about the late election in Delaware as well as the Senator from that State, though he is better entitled to speak for that State than I am. But I know what the order was. It simply required an oath of allegiance to be taken. That is all.

Who shrank from it? Was there a loyal man in Delaware who shrank from taking the oath of allegiance in this crisis of our country? Was there a man whose heart was for his country, who favored the crushing out of this rebellion, and who favored the keeping from the ballot-box the men whose hearts were in the rebel States, who shrank from it? No, sir. There were men there who were reluctant to take upon their lips the oath of allegiance to their country; and in order to make an outcry about it they declined to go to the polls. They knew that whether they took the oath or not they would be defeated in the election, so they made a virtue of necessity. Even if they had voted, there is no doubt of what would have been the result in that State. It was a foregone conclusion last autumn, and it will be so in the next election, for that State is taking her position, as other States are, by the Government of the country, and for the Government of the country, and against the cause, the only cause, of this rebellion, and of all this crime and bloodshed that have stained our country.

General Schenck on the battle-field has devotedly fought for his country, and he now bears, and is to bear while he lives, the evidence of it upon his person. His administration of the affairs of the department of Maryland were conducted with great ability, and won the confidence and admiration of the loyal men of that department and of the country. His wise and statesmanlike policy in that department is before the country; and yet, sir, he is denounced here. General Burnside and other generals are denounced for their action in Kentucky; and so it has been wherever an effort has been made to preserve the ballot-boxes of the country for the patriotic and loyal men of the country of all parties. Sir, I have no respect for these efforts to protect rebels and rebel sympathizers.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to ask the Senator who denounced General Burnside? I have not heard his name mentioned before.

Mr. WILSON. I did not hear the Senator denounce him in this debate. He referred, however, to the action of the military authorities in Kentucky, and we know that General Burnside issued an order in regard to the last election in Kentucky, for which his name has been branded from one end of the country to the other, if not in the Senate to-day. So in the State of Missouri, the loyal men of that State asked the Government to interfere by military force to keep disloyal men, the men who are fighting for the rebellion, from the ballot-box. It may be that some officers employed may have made mistakes; there may have been some improper action; but that is incident to all matters of government, civil or military. But the general object, the general purpose was well intended, patriotic, and right. I stand by it now, and I demand that the Government shall stand by it in the future, and that as these rebel States are broken down by the military power of the country, the men who have the blood of loyal men on their hands and on their souls shall not go to the ballot-box and control the destinies of those States or affect the policy of the Government unless they take an oath of allegiance to the country, and swear to Almighty God to stand by the country they have striven to destroy. I know that many of these rebels will swear, and swear falsely. It seems that these men who have raised their hands against their country have lost all sense of honor and all fear of God. I have little confidence in the men who take the oath of allegiance, but I would require it of them, and no one of them should ever be permitted to approach the ballot-box without taking that oath of allegiance to their country.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him a question. He has spoken very denunciatorily of those persons whose hearts he says are in the rebel States, and he speaks very approvingly of the military orders about elections. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts this question: has the military commander of a department in one of the loyal or adhering States the power to issue an order prescribing the qualifications of voters in that State—I am speaking of a loyal State, a State that adheres to the Union—when those qualifications are in conflict with the constitution and laws of that State, and enforced by test oaths? That is a question I should like him to answer.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot think there is any doubt about it at all in a State like Kentucky—a State that has had thousands of its men in the ranks of the rebellion; a State over a large portion of which there has been civil war. I do not think there can be any question that the officer who has command in the State of Kentucky has a right to enforce the laws of that State and protect loyal men in voting, and keep disloyal men out, unless those disloyal or suspected men are willing to take an oath of allegiance to the country.

Mr. POWELL. With great deference to the Senator, he has not answered my question. I asked him if the commander of a military department in the loyal States, a State like Massachusetts, for instance, or Ohio, or Indiana, has the right to prescribe qualifications for a voter, by proclamation or order, when that proclamation or order is in violation of the constitution and laws of the State? The Senator says they had a right to enforce the laws in Kentucky. I am able to show to the Senator that the military commanders there, notwithstanding our law is very stringent on this subject, have issued proclamations outside of the law, prescribed qualifications for voters, and made them take test oaths, and went far beyond our law in some respects. I want to know where they get the power to do this?

I have been taught to believe that under our system of government the people of each State had the right to fix the qualifications of its voters. So says the Constitution of the United States in the clause in which it fixes the qualification for voters for officers of the Federal Government. It says they shall be qualified who are qualified by the laws of the States to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, indicating clearly that it is with the States to fix the qualification of voters. I repeat, I have been taught to believe that this was a power that belonged to the States, and I have not heard it doubted.

Why, sir, if the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts be true, the commander of the department to which Massachusetts belongs would have a right on the eve of an election to prescribe a qualification to a voter just as much as he would in Kentucky; for Kentucky is a loyal and adhering State. While some of our people have gone off to the rebellion, the State has never faltered in its loyalty to the Union. I put it to that Senator to know whether he would be willing for one of the officers of the Army of the United States in command of the State of Massachusetts, and on the eve of an election, to prescribe the qualifications of voters, when those qualifications were in violation of the qualifications prescribed by the constitution and laws of Massachusetts? Would he as a freeman submit to it for a moment? If the Senator's proposition be correct, if they can make one test they can make another. If they have the power to fix the qualifications of voters, they have the power to fix them just as they please. If they have the power to demand in the State of Delaware, for instance, an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the country from the man who has never been in rebellion, they have a right in Massachusetts to demand that he swear before he votes that he has never been an abolitionist, or never belonged to the Democratic party or the old Whig party. If you grant the power, you acknowledge a principle that will overthrow your Government.

Sir, the Commonwealth of Kentucky has on her statute-books laws, which it is unnecessary for me to state again, on this very subject. The judges of the election or any bystander has the right to demand of every man who approaches the polls, that he should take an oath that he has not borne arms in this rebellion, or given aid and comfort to it; and if he refuses, the law provides that his vote shall not be taken; and yet, notwithstanding that qualifications larger than those are prescribed by the military, other test oaths are required.

I am not speaking of States that have attempted to secede. I am alluding to the adhering States of the Union. If the Senator admits the principle in one State, he admits a principle that will allow the military throughout this country, at the point of the bayonet, to propose such qualifications as will always elect the candidates of the party they are in favor of. Sir, the elections, if conducted in that way, would be as much a mockery as they were in England in the time of Cromwell, when he laid off that country into twelve districts, and placed twelve major generals over them, clothed with absolute power.

I wish Senators to look this question squarely in the face as it is, not to throw off on a State here or there, the people of which are unfortunately divided in this contest; but I demand to know from whence they derive this power. I hold that no officer of this Government, high or low, has any power except that with which he is clothed by the Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof; and whenever he transcends the power conferred by the Constitution and laws, be he President, major general, Congressman, Senator, or any other official, he is a usurper, and a liberty-loving people will treat him as such. All are usurpers who do not administer the functions of their office in obedience to the laws, or who exercise powers with which they are not clothed by the Constitution and laws. This, Mr. President, is a weighty question, and one that lies at the very foundations of our liberties; and I wish gentlemen to meet it fairly; I wish them to show the clause in the Constitution upon which they predicate this great power of a commander-in-chief. He does not have it, sir; he is not clothed with it; and he who executes the order, and he who makes it, are alike usurpers, and deserve to be treated as such, and in all time to come will be so considered.

You may prate of human liberty as you please; but there is no liberty save in the supremacy of the laws. The laws are supreme and above all. All the magistracy are or should be obedient to the laws. They are the creatures of the law. They can exercise no function not conferred by the law.

Mr. President, I think when the time shall come to discuss this bill; I shall be able to show, not only from reason, but from analogy and precedent, that it ought to be passed. While I am up, sir, in consequence of the declaration of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will move a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate declined to refer this bill to the Judiciary Committee, for the reason, among others, that that Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has proclaimed hostility to the measure. I do not think a bill of this importance should be handed over to a committee who are ready to strangle it. The Senator—and I admire the manliness with which he has done it—has avowed his hostility to it, and I hope the Senate will reconsider its vote. I will not again enter into the argument on the subject-matter of the bill to show that it properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee, but I do hope the Senate will not send a matter of this importance to a committee who are ready to murder it in cold blood.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that as he voted, according to the recollection of the Chair, with the minority, it is not competent for him to move a reconsideration.

Mr. POWELL. That is true, sir. I acknowledge the rule and withdraw the motion; but I do hope some Senator who voted with the majority will make that motion.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I said very frankly to the Senator from Kentucky that I was opposed to his bill. If the Senate choose to send it to the committee of which I am a member, very well; if they choose to send it anywhere else, the same. I have no desire to have it go to my committee, or to deal with it. I said frankly in advance, what I thought I ought to say, that I was opposed to any legislation on this subject in the present condition of our country. My mind is made up, my position is taken.

Sir, I do not understand that the action complained of imposes a qualification of voters, or is an attempt to prescribe a qualification of voters. The States make their own election laws. This is a requisition, an order made that certain persons shall take the oath of allegiance before they exercise the right of suffrage. The Senator asks me if I am willing that it shall be applied to my State. I answer, if the necessities of the country require it, I am. I am willing to take that oath of allegiance at sunrise and at sunset. Whenever and wherever I am asked to take it, I am willing to do it, and I am willing that every man in my State shall be required to take it. But, sir, I claim that there is no necessity for it there. If the time shall come when we have a portion of our people in sympathy with the rebellion, coöperating with it, running into it and coming out of it, giving aid and comfort to it, then I shall be willing that the commander of that department shall, by the authority of the Government, proclaim military law, and require at the ballot-box that the oath of allegiance to the country shall be taken. And, sir, there is no danger to any man's liberty in this country growing out of the effort to keep rebel ballots out of the ballot-box; there never has been; and the outcry about violated rights that has rung through the land is false in fact, and has been only in the interest of the rebellion.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky knows, we all know, that a portion, a large portion, of the people of Kentucky have been in the rebellion. He knows that there are thousands of men to-day on the soil of Kentucky with treason in their hearts. We all know it. Then ought those men to shape the policy of Kentucky in this hour of trial? Ought we to send thousands of our young men into that State, who are emptying out their blood upon its soil to defend the country, and then allow traitors, cowardly traitors, who have not taken up arms with Breckinridge and Morgan and Preston and Marshall, to go to the ballot-box and vote what they could not maintain with arms in their hands? I know no party in this matter; I care nothing about party interests in relation to it; but I do believe that in every military department where there are disturbances, where there are revolutionary proceedings, where there is danger to our country, it is the duty of the Government to require the oath of allegiance to be taken, the good of the country making it necessary; and I believe men loyal and true will joyfully take that oath, and that men who shrink from it do so for partisan purposes, or out of sympathy with the rebellion. That is my conviction; that is the conviction of the loyal and true men of the country.

Sir, what are we to have in the rebel States? We believe that, as our military power advances, the rebellion will be crushed out. We know that traitors will rush to the ballot-box to save their lives and their property, and direct and control public affairs. If we let them come at all, I think that the least we can require of them is that they shall take the oath of allegiance to their country. Sir, it is poor business, when thousands of our men are to-day in the land of the rebellion fighting and bleeding to maintain the cause of our menaced country, for the Congress of the United States to be passing laws striking at the Government, because it requires those bold, bad men to take an oath of allegiance to their country before they shall approach the ballot-box of the country.

I know the American people are against any such legislation. The people of this country have always been with the Government in these acts denounced as arbitrary, and they are with it to-day. Their only complaint is that the Government has not been efficient and bold enough in carrying out this policy; and the bolder the Government is, the more the heart of the people throbs in support of it. Senators may arraign the Government here during all this session; they may introduce resolutions that I regard as personally insulting to every man in the Senate and in the Government, but the patriotic people of the country will take care of the country, and take care of these men too. I have no anxiety about it, none at all.

I know, sir, that when this war commenced thousands of the men of the State of Kentucky took arms and rushed into rebellion. I know that some of her leading men advised Kentucky to maintain an armed neutrality, and not stand by their country, and these men have illustrated since on all occasions their hostility to what the Government has been doing to put down the rebellion. I say to Senators here to-day, you may arraign the Government for these acts in defense of the nation as much as you please, but if the Government will stand up boldly and manfully, and put its iron hand upon the traitors wherever it finds them, the people of the country will stand by the Government, put down this rebellion, and the men who have been and now are denouncing the Government for patriotic action in support of the unity of the Republic and the liberties of coming generations.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall not enter, Mr. President, into any defense of the people of the State of Delaware, or any portion of the people of the State of Delaware, against the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. He professes to know a great deal about the State of Delaware. I am very glad that his knowledge is so extensive; but that Senator will allow me to remark that the people of that State did not learn their lessons in loyalty, their principles of loyalty, either from the State of Massachusetts, from its Senators, or from any of its inhabitants; and when they seek for correct definitions of those terms, for a correct knowledge of those principles, they will consult such oracles as to them may seem proper. I will not retort by saying that there are traitors in Massachusetts. It becomes not me to arraign Massachusetts or her people. I shall not do so. I leave such work as that to those whose tastes it may suit.

But, sir, when or where has Delaware or her people shown any want of devotion to this Union? When, where, and how have they shown any want of devotion to the principles of civil liberty? In the battles of the Revolution, when they were fighting for the preservation and assertion of these liberties, the State of Delaware did her part. In every war in which the country has been engaged with a foreign Power, the State of Delaware and her authorities have been found on the side of the United States, and they have not been found sending ambassadors to Hartford Conventions. Neither have they been found urging upon the Mexicans to welcome Americans with bloody hands to hospitable graves, or asserting that under any circumstances such a course would be proper. Since the commencement of these unfortunate troubles, no company has been raised in the State of Delaware to join the forces at war with the United States. I will venture to say today, that if the truth could be ascertained, there are more men in the army of Jefferson Davis from the State of Massachusetts than there are from the State of Delaware. And sir, I will say, that at the very commencement of these troubles, when the southern States were inviting the cooperation of the border States in their movement, the State of Delaware, by a Democratic Legislature, passed a resolution that secession was no remedy for existing evils, and declaring that her people would not embark in any such work.

But, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts says that the reason of this objection is that the Democratic party of the State of Delaware stayed from the polls because they knew it to be a hopeless task; they were defeated anyhow. I am amazed that the Senator should have acquired such absolute knowledge of the state of affairs in Delaware from one visit to the city of Wilmington and the northern part of the State, where I believe he addressed members of his own party. I am surprised that he could have acquired such general information in so short a time. However, that is his opinion. My opinion is exactly the contrary; and that, had it not been for this military interference, no such result as was proclaimed could possibly have taken place in the State of Delaware.

But, Mr. President, it seems that whenever opposition is made to any act of this Administration, or any of its subordinates, those opposing its action are to be presumed guilty of disloyalty; and we have arrived at this time in the history of what was once the free Republic of the United States, where freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and freedom of the press were emblazoned upon every political banner, and where we thought we were the freest people on the face of the earth, that conformity to the views of the party in power, ay, sir, conformity even to those of its subordinates, is to be regarded as a test of devotion to the country, and nonconformity of opinion as the evidence of disloyalty and want of fidelity to the Government. Mr. President, if such views are really entertained by the great mass of those who now control the political affairs of this country, we are ripe for despotism, constitutional liberty is at an end, and the genius of American liberty has taken its flight, never again to visit this country.

I will not dwell upon this question, Mr. President; I leave the discussion; I was drawn into it by the remarks of my friend from Indiana. But I will repeat, in conclusion, (what perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts did not hear, because he stated that in his opinion no one could refuse to take that oath unless from a want of loyalty,) that nineteen of the leading members of his own party, at one voting place, refused to take it. Ninety-five took it and nineteen refused to take it; and the provost marshal was sent for to prevent the judges of election from administering it, and those nineteen men voted without taking it. What consideration governed those gentlemen? They were apostles in the present political Government church. They declined to take the oath. Was it from a want of loyalty? Not, sir, if loyalty consists in approving, heart and soul, of every act this Administration has done in the past, is now doing, or shall do in the future, because I doubt not that every one of them would approve them all. But, Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong the discussion.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I was pleased to hear one utterance of the Senator from Massachusetts. In response to my question, he admitted that the States alone have the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters. In that he was correct. It is strange to me that a Senator who harps so much about loyalty, who avows that the States alone have the right to fix the qualifications of voters, (in which position he is certainly correct,) should say that he approves and justifies the Government in all that it has done. Why, sir, does not the Senator know that major generals in the Army of the United States, that those who bear the commissions of brigadiers and colonels, and even lower grades, have prescribed qualifications of voters which were in conflict with the qualifications prescribed in the constitutions and laws of the States?

The Senator says that he sustains the Government. I do not know exactly what he means by the Government; but I suppose, and, indeed, I am confident, that he means Mr. Lincoln, the President, and those in authority. I do not regard Mr. Lincoln and his Administration as the Government of the United States. I am in favor of the Government of the United States. I regard the Constitution and the laws, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities which that sacred instrument extends to the people, as the Government. The President is but the agent appointed by the people to exercise the functions of the chief Executive, as prescribed in the Constitution. Mr. Lincoln and his military officers are no more the Government than this Senate is the Government. We of the Senate are no more the Government than the Supreme Court of the United States is the Government. We are but coordinate branches of the same Government, the agents of the people to carry on the Government ordained by our fathers, under the Constitution, and to perform the various functions prescribed in that instrument, and the laws made in pursuance of it.

But, sir, in what an attitude does the Senator place himself by making the admission that he has made, that the States alone have a right to prescribe the qualifications of voters! He approves of the action of the President and the military authorities in this country in committing plain, palpable infractions and violations of the law, because it is a fact undisputed that they have prescribed qualifications of voters in conflict with those prescribed by the laws of the States, and enforced their orders by test oaths at the point of the bayonet. When the thing is divested of verbiage, and all the Senator's talk about loyalty is thrown out of the way, he stands here the avowed apologist, and not only the apologist, but the justifier, the approver, the commender of acts, on the part of certain officers of this Government, which he himself admits were in violation of the Constitution and laws of the country. That is the attitude in which the Senator places himself. He comes out boldly and fearlessly, and heartily approves and sanctions plain, palpable violations of law; and that, too, upon one of the most important and delicate matters known to the republican form of government, the right of suffrage. I was glad the Senator made the admission which he did make. Admitting that, as the lawyers say, he has put himself out of court. He not only approves but eulogizes the conduct of those who have violated the laws, and he stands forth the apologist and enologist of those who knowingly, wittingly, and avowedly violate the Constitution and laws of the country. That is the Senator's attitude, and there is no art of the logician that can extricate him from it.

But, sir, gentlemen speak of the President and his officers of the Army as the Government. I am rather astonished at that. I had always thought they were the creatures, the agents, not the creators. Did Mr. Lincoln make the people and the States of the Union? No, sir; they clothed him with the power that he has; they put the robes of office upon him; and yet gentlemen now call the President the Government, and the people poor, miserable subjects. I thought all along, and still think, that he is but the instrument, but the agent, whom the people have clothed with temporary, limited, and prescribed power, and that the people are the masters in whom the sovereignty resides; and until the Senator can prove to me that Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, made the States or the people, I cannot admit that the President is the Government. I cannot admit it because I know the very converse to be true.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I do hope that some Senator who voted in the majority will move to reconsider this vote, and let my bill go to a place where it can have a fair chance. I think I can claim certainly that much courtesy from some gentleman on that side. It is known that I have not been in the habit of asking courtesy, but in this particular case I do ask it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I should like to ask him if the President of the United States, under the Constitution, has not as much power in South Carolina to-day as he has in Ohio, or Indiana, or Kentucky; and if not, why not? Has he a particle of power in one State that he has not in the other?

Mr. POWELL. I will answer the Senator with great pleasure. The President of the United States has not as much power to-day in South Carolina as he has in Indiana, for the very reason that those people are in arms against the United States. I suppose the question the Senator wishes answered is whether I think South Carolina had a right to secede. I thought it was well known to the Senate that I always repudiated the doctrine of secession. I suppose the object of the gentleman's question was to know whether I believed in the right of secession. I state to him that I do not and I never did believe in it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The object of my question was entirely different. I asked the Senator from Kentucky if he believed the President had any more power in South Carolina than he had in Indiana to-day. His answer is, as I understand it, that he has more power. If he has more power, why is it that he has it? Because there is a rebellion existing in the country, and because, under the Constitution, it is his duty to suppress that rebellion. The object of my question was to get at that point. Now, his duty being to suppress the rebellion, that being his duty under the Constitution, as Commander-in-Chief, he has authority to appoint subordinate agents in different States to effect that object. In order to suppress the rebellion, for instance, in Maryland or Delaware, he appoints a military commander; that military commander, acting under his authority, issues an order to preserve the purity of elections, and to prevent traitors from voting. If he has that additional authority, it is under the war-making power as Commander-in-Chief, and because the rebellion exists. Now, suppose to-day an election were ordered by the local authorities in the State of South Carolina, and they should meet together to elect traitors to the House of Representatives, or traitors as members of this body, would he have a right to interfere with that election, to say that traitors should not vote to send members to either branch of Congress? If he has that right in South Carolina, he must surely have it in every other State where the necessity exists, and the discretion, after all, is left to the President. If he believes that for the suppression of the rebellion it is necessary to establish a military department in Kentucky, or Delaware, or Maryland, and to prevent the votes of disloyal men being received, he has no more right to the exercise of that authority there, under the Constitution, than he would have in a State in rebellion; but in a state of rebellion he has full and plenary authority in every State to do whatsoever is necessary to suppress that rebellion.

This is a new state of things, not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, because they never contemplated the dissolution of the Government they framed, and they never provided for the obsequies which should attend its death and burial. I think it is within the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief, under his duty to suppress the rebellion, to provide in these tainted districts that disloyal men shall not be permitted to vote. It is his duty to meet and break in pieces the power of the rebel armies upon the field of battle; and if there is resistance at home, an organized rebel resistance, even through the ballot-box, calculated to subvert the liberties of the people and to overthrow the Constitution of the country, it is as much his duty to provide for that emergency as it is to repel an invading army. I broadly sanction the order of General Schenck, and every other military order tending to prevent the reception of the votes of disloyal persons. The test of that disloyalty is that they refuse to take an oath of allegiance to their Government. Will any man here say that a citizen is a proper voter who will not take an oath of allegiance to support the Government which protects him, and under which he lives? If any man takes that position, I dissent from him. I would preserve the purity of the ballot-box under all circumstances and any circumstances, and at all hazards. I would use bayonets to prevent the votes of disloyal persons from subverting the liberties of the country. I stand upon that now and forever, and I believe that order was necessary and proper.

The question after all is, is a disloyal man a good voter, is he a safe voter? How will you test the question of his loyalty? We propose to test it by an oath, and if he will not, in a solemn appeal to Almighty God and in the presence of his fellow-men, swear to support the Government, he should have no right to interfere in the administration of that Government; with my action and my vote, so help me God, he shall have no such right. [Applause in the galleries.]

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Order!

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, my friend from Indiana seems to be very broad in sanctioning these military orders. I never before heard that Maryland was in a state of rebellion. I did not know it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I will ask what that has to do with the constitutional power under the Constitution of the United States? Has there been any change in that Constitution since the rebellion broke out? Are not all the powers of the President, resulting from his province as Commander-in-Chief, precisely what they were at the commencement of the rebellion?

Mr. POWELL. The Senator and I differ very widely as to what are the legitimate powers of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. I hold that the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, can only use such materiel and men and munitions as Congress has granted to him to suppress the rebellion, to fight enemies in the field. He has no right to go to the loyal States and prescribe the qualifications of a voter. Why, sir, the Senator speaks of Maryland as in a state of rebellion.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. POWELL. I so understood. I really am of opinion that when Senators come to reflect on this matter, they will admit that many of these military orders have been grossly in violation of law. I have not criticised the course of General Schenck, but I saw in the public journals that the Governor of the State of Maryland, who I believe on all hands is admitted to be a loyal man—I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with him—took sharp issue with General Schenck in regard to his military orders, and the matter was referred to the President, and the President modified them to some extent. The present Governor of Maryland, whose Unionism I never heard doubted, protested against those orders of General Schenck, and they were partially countermanded. I have not those orders before me, I never examined them very minutely; but I believe it was conceded on all hands that he proscribed qualifications and oaths that the Governor of Maryland said were in conflict with the laws of that State, and the President modified them in some respects. In that state of things, the election in Maryland was carried, and it was paraded as a great triumph of the party that succeeded.

Mr. President, whenever an election cannot be held in any place without resort to the military, we ought to have no election at all. Let elections, if they are held, be free. That is the only mode in which the people can be represented. But I will show to honorable Senators, before we get through with this subject, that in some places oaths have been prescribed to voters to make them swear that they were in favor of the President's administrative policy. Yes, sir. I have such oaths in my possession, and I will bring them to the Senate before this debate is over.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I certainly did not characterize Maryland as a State in rebellion. I never dreamed such a thing.

Mr. POWELL. I may have been mistaken, but I thought so. I will admit I was mistaken, if the Senator says so. I do not wish to place the Senator in a false position.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNTIES TO VOLUNTEERS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 16) to continue the bounties heretofore paid; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I am inclined to think that it is unnecessary to refer the resolution to the Military Committee; but I should like to have it printed, with the understanding that we shall take it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. COLLAMER. Why not concur in it now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall object to its being considered finally to-day. I have no objection to any intermediate action, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's objection can afterwards be well taken to final action.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read the second time.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask that it be read at length.

The joint resolution received its second reading at length. It proposes to continue from January 5 to March 1, 1864, to men enlisting in the regular or volunteer forces for three years or during the war, the bounties heretofore paid under regulations and orders from the War Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be printed, of course.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused from serving on the special committee on the bankrupt law. I find that my duties on the committee of which I had been already a member will engross all my time. I therefore beg the House to excuse me.

Mr. KELLEY was excused.

Subsequently, Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. KELLEY.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday, which was on seconding the previous question on the following resolution offered by Mr. BRANDEGEE:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, with authority to examine into the expediency of the establishment of a new route for postal and other purposes between New York and Washington, to whom shall be referred all petitions and papers on that subject, and who shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On a division of the House, no quorum voted.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called; when the following named members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ames, Ashley, Jacob B. Blair, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Denney, Driggs, Dumont, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kaufbein, Orlando Kellogg, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Lovejoy, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, and Benjamin Wood.

One hundred and ten members answered to their names.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK—AGAIN.

The question occurred on the previous question on Mr. BRANDEGEE's resolution, on which the Speaker ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. BRANDEGEE and THOMAS.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 42.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. BRANDEGEE called for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether, under the 43d rule of the House, a motion to refer the resolution to a standing committee of the House will not take precedence.

The SPEAKER. It will not, the previous question having been sustained to refer it to a select committee. If the previous question had not been sustained, the motion to refer to a standing committee would have taken precedence.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eliot, Fansworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Orth, Perlman, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Stebbins, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—66.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Kelley, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Pritty, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Webster, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—45.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ARNOLD stated that his colleague, Mr. LOVEJOY, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. ANCONA made a like statement in reference to his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANLER made a like statement in reference to his colleague, Mr. BENJAMIN WOOD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SMALL-POX IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the regular business is proceeded with, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution which is in the nature of a privileged question, inasmuch as it affects the safety of every member of this House.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to call the attention of the municipal or other authorities to the existence and prevalence of the small-pox within the District, and to urge upon them the necessity of the immediate establishment of suitable hospitals, the enforcement of stringent and necessary sanitary regulations, the adoption of some general and, if necessary, compulsory system of vaccination, and such other measures as shall tend to prevent the further spread, within the District, of this terrible scourge of mankind.

Mr. COX. I would not object to the resolution, but I think it will be entirely ineffectual. This Congress ought to do something in the matter itself, for the municipality will do nothing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest to my friend from Ohio that this resolution merely instructs the committee to make inquiries into the matter.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to there being inquiries made. It would be a great disaster if members of Congress should be taken off.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced and adopted.

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. DAWES. For reference or for adoption?

The SPEAKER. They are either for reference or for adoption.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, reported back House bill No. 9, to fix the time for holding elections for Representatives in Congress, and to enable soldiers in the service of the United States to vote for such officers; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

SITTINGS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of Elections be authorized to hold its sessions during the sessions of the House.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of Ways and Means have the same privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RESTORATION.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House joint resolution No. 7, concerning the restoration of civil authority of certain States and of the United States within regions once under the control of the existing rebellion; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution to continue bounties heretofore paid; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution provides that the bounties heretofore paid under the regulations and orders from the War Department, to men now enlisting in the regular or volunteer forces of the United States for three years or during the war, shall continue to be paid from the 5th of January, 1864, to the 1st of March next; anything in the act approved December 23, 1863, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the reason that the 1st of March is fixed, instead of the 1st of February, is that the intelligence of this fact may reach the different departments of the Army in extreme portions of the country. Enlistments, as we all know, ceased yesterday throughout the country from the non-payment of the bounties under the law which we passed on the 23d of December.

The extension of the time for payment of bounties is recommended by both the War Department and the President. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection on the part of any member of the House; for certainly it is far preferable to raise men by volunteer enlistment by the payment of liberal bounties than to raise them by draft.

Mr. COX. Will my friend yield to me?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I would inquire of my friend from Illinois whether the Committee on Military Affairs have considered the proposition for a total repeal of the conscription law, and whether this is to be in lieu of it; whether the general policy of volunteering is to be adopted by the party in power; whether we are to have nothing but volunteering?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not aware that any action has been taken in reference to that subject. We did not regard that as important for the action of the House on this resolution.

Mr. COX. Let me ask the gentleman another question for information. What are the bounties which are now paid?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Under the regulations of the War Department?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. To veterans $400 and to new men $300. Bounties are paid by installments. The amount of bounty paid to a veteran on enlistment is forty dollars, I think, together with one month's pay in advance, and a premium of two dollars, which has always been paid. The bounty paid to new men is not quite so much. Bounties are paid by installments during period of service.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to ask whether there is any law for the payment of bounties, or whether they are paid under proclamations or regulations or orders of the War Department? Is that all the authority there is for the payment of these bounties?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There is no law for the payment of bounties after the 5th of January.

Mr. CHANLER. Then there is no law on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. This resolution authorizes the payment of bounties after the 5th of January. Does it authorize the payment of bounties to colored soldiers?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This simply continues the payment of bounties now authorized by orders of the War Department.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether the War Department has considered that question. I am not aware that colored soldiers receive the bounties now provided. I hope that there will soon be some action taken on the subject. It seems to me a shame that there should be a discrimination between the men who are in the Army fighting for the country.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. COX. There is a good deal of misunderstanding on this question. Do I understand that there never was any law authorizing the payment of bounties?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not aware that at the commencement of the payment of these bounties there was any act of Congress upon the subject. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] was a member of the last Congress, while I was not, and he should be better posted upon that matter than I am.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say to the gentleman that when we passed the enlistment law we gave a commutation of $300 to those who were drafted and did not serve, and we expressly authorized that money to be used for the procurement of substitutes; and therefore it is right to take the money arising from this $300 commutation to make the Army equal in number to those who paid the commutation.

Mr. COX. It seems to me unusual legislation to bring in a bill to appropriate money for an object, and basing that appropriation simply upon the proclamations of the War Office. I do not know what those proclamations are. I do not know whether they include black soldiers, or white soldiers, or red soldiers. I do not know how much is to be paid. That depends upon proclamations issued almost every day, and with which members of Congress are not familiar. I think the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois ought to be very specific, showing exactly how much should be paid. Otherwise it will be subject to a hundred different interpretations.

I do not make any objection to this bill capotiously, but I wish to encourage this system of volunteering, and to wipe out this conscription law entirely; and hence I will vote for almost anything to break down the system of conscription. I hope this will do it; and I accept this move as the beginning, by members upon the other side, to get rid of that system.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not able to meet with the Military Committee when this resolution was under consideration. I did not reach the city till a few minutes before the House met this morning; but if I understand the matter correctly from the public journals, the request of the President and the War Department was to continue the payment of bounties until the 1st of February next; but the resolution before the House proposes to extend the payment until the 1st of March. And while the President asks us to continue the payment of bounties to veteran volunteers only, this resolution extends it to all volunteers, whether veterans or raw recruits. If the resolution prevails, it seems to me we shall swamp the finances of the Government before the 1st of March arrives. I cannot consent to vote for a measure which authorizes the expenditure of so vast a sum as will be expended under this resolution, unless it be shown absolutely indispensable to the work of filling up the Army. I am anxious that veterans should volunteer, and that liberal bounties be paid to them. But if we extend the payment to all classes of volunteers for two months to come, I fear we shall swamp the Government.

Before I vote for this resolution, I desire to know whether the Government is determined to abandon the draft. If it be its policy to raise an army solely by volunteering and paying bounties, we have one line of policy to pursue. If the conscription law is to be anything better than a dead letter on the statute-book, our line of policy is a very different one. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to inform me which course is to be adopted. I am sorry to see in this resolution the indication of a timid and vacillating course. It is unworthy the dignity of our Government and our Army to use the conscription act as a scarecrow, and the bounty system as a bait, to alternately scare and coax men into the Army.

Let us give liberal bounties to veteran soldiers who may reenlist, and for raw recruits use the draft.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In reply to my colleague I will say I do not understand it to be the policy of the Government to abandon the draft; but I do understand it to be their policy to get men—to get them first by enlistment, if they can, but at all events to get men to fill up the Army. It is the object of this resolution to give the people of the country, who seem now to have the spirit of enlistment, an opportunity to fill up the quota by enlistments under this liberal bounty. If that is not done in a reasonable time, the Army is to be filled up at all events. I do not understand that the payment of this bounty will swamp the country.

Under the draft, if that system should be pursued to the exclusion of the volunteering system, I am inclined to think that it would cost us as much, or more, to get these men, and put them in the field, as it will under the system of paying these bounties. The bounties, it will be remembered, are not to be paid all at once. If a man enlists, and is therefore entitled to his $300 bounty, the $300 is not to be paid him upon his being mustered into the service, but only a proportion of it; the balance is to be paid from time to time by installments during the period of his service. If he is an unworthy man, if he deserts, or if he is disqualified by physical disability, and is therefore discharged from the service, he only gets those installments of the bounty which have been paid him during the period he has served. It is not taking $300 out of the Treasury now and paying it to the man.

The President, it is true, in his message to Congress, recommends the continuance of the payment of these bounties at least, I think is his expression, until the 1st day of February. I know that the War Department is favorable to an extension of the bounties beyond that period. It is the opinion of the War Department that the quotas of the several States, or nearly the entire quotas, under the last call for three hundred thousand men, can be made up by enlistments if the bounties are continued to be paid for a reasonable time; and it is the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs that a continuance of these bounties until the 1st of February would not meet the case. It requires twenty or thirty days to communicate with some of the departments of the Army. It requires, I suppose, twenty days to communicate with General Banks's department. This resolution provides for the payment of bounties to veterans in the Army who shall reenlist. We want the men in General Banks's department, and in other departments in the extreme portions of the country, to have an opportunity of reenlisting, and availing themselves of the benefits of the bounty, for the Government desires the services of the veterans in the Army.

Mr. BROOKS addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that this debate has gone far enough.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman will not press so important a measure as this under the previous question, and without full discussion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman desires to ask a question, I will yield for that purpose, but not for any extended remarks.

Mr. BROOKS. It is difficult to ask a question under such circumstances.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of order. The joint resolution has in it an appropriation, and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order; the bill contains no appropriation.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will not allow discussion, the bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the point to which I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois is this: that there can be no more profitable discussion than upon this subject, and therefore I do not see why this measure should be pressed through the House under the previous question. The remarks of the gentleman himself have been very instructive to me, and, I have no doubt, to others; and the suggestions of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] a practical military gentleman, have also been instructive; and nothing, in my judgment, is more improper or unwise, upon great questions of this sort, than to hurry measures to immediate action without a proper comprehension of their provisions.

The gentleman from Illinois cannot doubt the patriotism, I think, of gentlemen upon this side of the House. We were in session but ten or eleven days prior to the holidays, and we voted over two million dollars every day that were not even in the estimates of the Departments, and in so voting we voted blindly. I was so much embarrassed by the remarks of two gentlemen on the other side of the House—one from Illinois, not now in his seat, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] and the other from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,]—who said they would take all the responsibility of legislation, that when a bill came in from the Senate annulling the whole bounty system, and in my eyes leading to immediate repudiation, I failed to rise and call the attention of the House to it, because I was apprehensive that some imputation would be cast upon me and upon this side of the House. And yet not forty-eight hours had elapsed—the very moment the bill had reached the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of War, the Administration of the Government, alarmed by the hasty action of this House, demanded an immediate repeal, through the President of the United States, in the message which he has submitted here, of that act of the Senate which was approved by the House without debate or discussion.

I call the attention of the House to this fact, and I say that this is not the proper mode of legislation. Upon this great subject of bounties and conscription, upon the mode and manner of raising soldiers for the Army of the United States, there should be free, full, and ample discussion; and all these efforts to crowd bills through the House without any discussion whatever, upon hasty reports from committees, and upon a single reading at the Clerk's desk, will lead to repeal upon repeal and confusion upon confusion. It is impossible, in the necessarily tumultuous manner in which proceedings are conducted in this House, to understand resolutions and bills unless they are properly and amply discussed. I beg the gentleman from Illinois, therefore, to throw open, at least for to-day, this whole subject for inquiry and investigation. Give us light. Let us be instructed. Do not look upon us upon this side of the House with this eye of suspicion, for we have demonstrated our patriotism to you. I repeat, in only ten days of our session we have voted $20,000,000 for bounties and $700,000 for the State of Missouri—all deficiencies, and none of which are in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury submitted here.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must insist that the gentleman is not asking his question. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope it will not be sustained. Mr. COX. Is it in order now to re-move to refer this joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I give notice that I shall make that motion, if the previous question be not sustained.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 55, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and GARFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 27.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; being upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SWEAT demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 2; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brundage, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Davies, Davison, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grider, Hale, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Higby, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazzar, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Garfield and Grinnell—2.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to change the time from the 1st day of March to the 5th of February.

The SPEAKER. Amendments are not in order after the third reading of a joint resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I rose immediately after the result of the vote was announced.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is not exhausted till the joint resolution is read a third time, and after that time amendments are not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. I do this because I believe it would be more satisfactory to the House to shorten the time, and because I believe the bill will be thereby rendered more efficient. If we offer bounties at all, they ought to be offered to induce speedy enlistments. I move the previous question on the motion to reconsider, and call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL, and HARRIS, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 52.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has it been ruled that no amendment is in order?

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] be allowed to strike out the last clause of the bill—that it is to take effect from and after its passage. That clause is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The call of committees for reports was continued and completed.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER announced the next business in order to be the call of States for resolutions, under which bills for reference might be introduced.

RELEASE FROM ATTACHMENT.

Mr. ELIOT introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to release certain property from attachment, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PREVENTING COLLISIONS.

Mr. ELIOT also introduced a bill fixing certain rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the water; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUNISHMENT OF TREASON.

Mr. ELIOT also introduced a bill repealing part of the joint resolution explanatory of the act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HALL FOR STATUARY.

Mr. MORRILL introduced the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be requested to examine and report as to the expediency of setting apart the old hall of the House of Representatives as a hall for statuary; and also as to the cost of a new flooring and bronze railing on each side of the passage-way through the hall, preparatory to the reception of such works of art.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was agreed to.

NINE MONTHS' VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of including in the draft now ordered by the President of the United States those who volunteered into the nine months' service, and report by bill or otherwise.

BUILDING OF STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. SWEAT submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to report a bill authorizing the President to appoint a scientific board, whose duty it shall be forthwith to make a thorough examination into the theory adopted by the Government in the construction of the steam vessels built under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and to report the practical working thereof; also, whether or not the engines now used in vessels in our naval service differ from those used in the steam marines of Europe and in the merchant vessels of this country, and in what said difference consists; and whether or not, as now constructed and applied, they are in accordance with well-known scientific laws pertaining to them, or in clear and open defiance thereof; and whether the recognized law of the "expansive power of steam" has been applied in such a manner as to obtain the highest possible rate of speed and economy of fuel; and whether the adoption of engines constructed in accordance with this law, generally approved in Europe and this country, will not greatly economize the force of steam and insure much greater speed than has yet been attained in our steam vessels; and whose duty it shall be to report generally such improvements in the construction of vessels for our naval service as they may deem that the interests of the country demand; and that they have power to order a vessel, built on the plans now adopted by the Navy Department, to be run over measured distances, under the control of the inquiring bureau, with a view to ascertain the speed and power which may be developed by the use of the plans now adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Maine will so amend the resolution that the committee shall be directed to inquire into the expediency of doing what is proposed, I will not object.

Mr. SWEAT. That is the point I want to meet.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order even if the call for the previous question be withdrawn, for the resolution, if it gives rise to debate, must, under the rules, go over.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman adopt my amendment?

Mr. SWEAT. I do not propose to debate the resolution, but simply to answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will only say a few words.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman accept my suggestion? If he does not I will move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. SWEAT. I ask to say a word.

Objection was made.

Mr. SWEAT. If the object of the resolution were understood, there would be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine cannot discuss the resolution except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SWEAT. I cannot accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. SWEAT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SWEAT and STEVENS were appointed.

Mr. SWEAT. For the purpose of having this subject before the House in some way—I consider it important—I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I hope that he will withdraw the motion to lay upon the table. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

The resolution was adopted.

PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be directed to inquire what legislation is necessary, if any, more perfectly to organize the Pension Bureau and to facilitate the transaction of its business; and to report by bill or otherwise.

WASHINGTON CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. SWEAT submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to inquire into the question of the facilities afforded by the Washington city railroad for the carriage of passengers, and, if of the opinion that the same are inadequate, that they have power to report by bill or otherwise, as they may deem proper.

STEAMER HOWQUA.

Mr. PIKE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House a copy of the report of Acting Lieutenant Edward F. Devens of the treatment of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Howqua, in Halifax harbor, in June last, when said steamer was at Halifax for the purpose of coaling.

ACTING OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. PIKE also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint acting officers of the Navy, so as to extend the power of appointment so as to include acting officers above the grade of lieutenant.

PRIZE MONEY.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the prolonged delay in the distribution of prize money to the officers and seamen of our Navy is working serious injury to the service by creating distrust in the good faith of the Government, and thereby retarding enlistments: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the House, as promptly as may be, the reasons for this delay, in order that it may be remedied by additional legislation, if needful.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up and consider the Post Office appropriation bill, which was made the special order in that committee for this day.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RICE, of Maine, in the chair.)

Mr. STEVENS moved that the President's message be laid aside, and that the committee take up House bill No. 50, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read a first time for information, and then the Clerk proceeded to read it by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk has just read an appropriation of $7,849,000 for the transportation of the inland mails. I hope that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will explain that item. Will he point us to the estimate where it is provided for, so that we may see what it is? Let us know what we are doing, for this is a large sum of money.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, it is not customary for the estimates of the Post Office Department to be carried into the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury which are sent to the House, it being, or ought to be, a self-sustaining Department; but it has always been the habit of the Postmaster General to make out the estimates in manuscript, and send them to the Committee of Ways and Means for the amount required. I hold it in my hand, and it is in the words of this bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it the sum in the aggregate?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir, that is the only estimate and the only explanation from the Department.

Mr. BROOKS. That used to be a large sum when we were here young men together.

Mr. STEVENS. It used to be a large sum of money when we had added to it two thirds for deficiency for carrying the mails in the southern States. At present we are rid of that. The deficiency will now be a small amount. The gentleman is aware that the moneys received by the Post Office Department are turned into the Treasury and reappropriated in this manner. The deficiency is not one sixth of what it was when the States were all together.

Mr. BROOKS. I am much obliged to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I have no doubt the House is satisfied.

Mr. STEVENS. I am unable to give the gentleman any other information, because the Department has not furnished it to us. The language of the bill is in the words of the communication sent to the committee by the Department.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no doubt it is correct. I inquired for my own information upon the subject.

Mr. KASSON. This appropriation for inland transportation is confined exclusively to paying the amount required by contracts which are made and which continue for four years—the United States being divided into four divisions for this purpose. Contracts are made once in four years for each division. The estimate is simply to pay the amount which will be called for by contracts to be made in one of these divisions, and contracts which have been made in three of the divisions, for this year. It is in one part conjectural, and in the other part certain.

Mr. BROOKS. Is there any appropriation made here for carrying the mail from New York to Panama, or from Panama to San Francisco?

Mr. KASSON. We have no contract for that route at present.

The Clerk then resumed the reading of the bill, and advanced to the clause—

For payment of balances due foreign countries, $200,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to make an inquiry as to those two lines, thirty-five and thirty-six. I think I understand them, but I want to be sure. Is this a difference of postage against the United States in connection with other countries? Does it bring us $200,000 in debt?

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] just explained that.

Mr. KASSON. This appropriation arises from an adjustment of the postal balances between this country and foreign countries. Two or three foreign countries are usually indebted to the United States. France and England always have a balance against us, as well as one or two other countries. This is a balance which it is estimated will be due. We collect more postage in some cases than other foreign departments do, and in that case we have to pay a balance to them. The amount also depends, to some extent, upon which country furnishes the steamers which carry the mail.

Mr. BROOKS. How does this amount compare with the usual appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. KASSON. It is about the usual amount; and I beg to add, now that I am upon the floor, that the Department is at present engaged—and I mention it from my special connection with the matter—in revising all its postal treaties with foreign countries, in order to get rid of paying these balances, which at this time cost extravagantly, in consequence of the rate of exchange.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if there is any appropriation in this bill to pay the railroads between New York and Washington for carrying the mails?

Mr. STEVENS. There is a provision for punishing them when they fail—not in this bill, but in former bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the fines have been imposed as they should be, the companies would not have much left. And as this bill is open to general debate, it may be well to call the attention of the country for a few moments to the state of communication between the great commercial and political metropolises of the country. We are here connected with the commercial center only by railroads of a single track, which are under control of monopolies so powerful as apparently to defy every effort at reform. I understand the recent delay we have experienced on trips from New York, and which has been attributed to the weather and to the accumulation of ice in the Susquehanna, was not really so much the result of the ice and the weather as the result of the carelessness of the company in putting so many cars upon the boat as to ground it. Thus it has been that members of Congress and others have been delayed upon the trip twelve and fifteen hours.

I do not profess to have any great interest in this matter, because I hope and believe that, unless there shall be a reform instituted, the seat of Government must leave this barren and isolated and inhospitable region for the valley of the Mississippi, where we can feed the people; where we can give them good butter at a bit a pound, and chickens at two bits a pair, [laughter], and plenty, as a friend near me suggests, to drink—good water. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I have been somewhat surprised at what I have seen in this House in relation to this matter. Gentlemen are governed by the highest and purest motives, as a matter of course; but no man could fail to wonder somewhat that gentlemen living in New York and New England should interpose against any reform in this great line of communication. It may be asked, "What's the matter?" I will tell you "what's the matter." In the first place, these railroads between Washington and New York cannot do the business which the country demands; and in the second place, those gentlemen having control of them do not seem to wish to give all the accommodation which their roads might afford. What would have been our situation if these obstructions, which we have seen within the last week, and which may occur at any time during the winter months, had existed when this army of the Potomac was repulsed—this great army of the Potomac, which is "all quiet," I believe, at this time, and probably will be quiet until, perhaps, a great western general, who I trust will be made lieutenant general, shall have control of that army? And then, sir, I tell you there will be no very great danger from the elements or from the rebels, so far as your capital is concerned. But I will not enlarge upon these observations.

I am rejoiced that the House has shown its independence to-day by directing a committee to be appointed which shall examine into this whole subject, and I trust that committee will perform their duty without fear, favor, or affection. I have seen committees of the same sort raised before. I have seen suggestions made in regard to reforms, and no sooner were they made than it would be whispered that it was for some other purpose that those committees were raised; that there was some other object, blackmailing, or something else, that gentlemen desired to accomplish. I know that a committee will be appointed which will be influenced by no such considerations, but that it will go forward in the great work which the House has committed to it, and will show the country, and show the constituents of every man here who has constituents to visit him, what has been the control and policy of these corporations. Sir, they are only known now to the country by their impositions and their extortions upon the Government and upon the traveling community. Sir, if we could only get at the fact of the amounts which the Government has had to pay to these corporations, the country would be astounded. Enough has been paid, I undertake to say, to almost build a single track railroad between here and the city of New York. These companies seem to be perfectly lawless in all their dealings with the Government as well as with individuals. Why, a gentleman in New York told me, the other day, that he knew of another railroad which had recently charged the Government precisely four times the amount which it charges individuals for a certain service. Let these things be brought out before the country. Let the Government and let the people be protected from these outrages which have been so long inflicted upon the country.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know precisely to which items in this bill the gentleman's remarks apply. [Laughter.] I have no doubt they apply to some of them, as this bill is a special order, and therefore the gentleman would keep within the rules. But, sir, a great deal that the gentleman has said I have no doubt is correct. I do not rise to defend the railroads, having in my pocket no free tickets whatever, although I do not say that I should have rejected any if they had been offered me. [A laugh.] Certainly, sir, shall go for any number of railroads that capitalists will make with their own capital, whether it be between this and New York, or Philadelphia, or Boston, or anywhere else. So long as they ask no appropriation in money or bonds from this Government, I will go for one or for twenty railroads, for all monopolies of that kind I look upon as injurious to the interests of the country.

I do not know, sir, whether these railroad companies between here and New York are much at fault; whether they have not done all that they could, considering that there is but a single track, to facilitate trade and travel between these points. I know there was a time when to risk one's capital in making a railroad at all between this and New York was somewhat of a perilous adventure, and therefore I have some respect for the interests of gentlemen who at that time did embark in it; but, nevertheless, I say that they have no right to monopolize the whole business, unless they can do it fairly. Let any other man who chooses to make a railroad at his own cost, and pay damages to the owners of the soil over which he passes with his railroad, do it.

Still I am not quite prepared to denounce the management of these roads, because I do not know facts enough on which to found such denunciation. I know that there has lately been great delay in the transportation of freight and passengers; but the weather had something to do with it. It had a good deal to do with the delay between this city and Philadelphia. But that is no reason, as I said before, why other railroads should not be constructed. If there be any reason at all for refusing another track from here to New York, it consists in the fact that this Capitol is likely soon to be removed bodily from its present position to another place, to which there will have to be railroads made. If that shall appear to be the danger, as from the powerful influence of the gentlemen who have moved in it I fear it to be, then perhaps we had better suspend the construction of any further railroads until the Capitol be finally located somewhere. I have no doubt that the best place, if we were now seeking a location, is in the valley of the Mississippi, or on some of the waters that empty into that great river. I have no doubt at all that the water of the Mississippi would take more good liquor than any other, and still be wholesome. [Laughter.] I have no doubt that that is the very place to breed the tallest generals and bravest soldiers in the world. I therefore congratulate my friend [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] on living in that particular location where such tall men do thrive. [Laughter.] Still I do not see its exact bearing on this bill. I cannot very well see it. As to the lieutenant generality, I shall vote against creating any more lieutenant generals. We have got one already. We have one lieutenant general who is a retired lieutenant general.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. STEVENS. I am not sure of anything in the world. [Laughter.] If anybody suspects it, I will give it up as a doubtful question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I thought my friend was not entirely certain about that. I think that if he will look into the law he will perceive that there is no lieutenant general in the country. The law which he undoubtedly refers to was revived for the purpose of permitting the title by brevet to be given to a general.

Mr. STEVENS. I know that our lieutenant generality was only by brevet. I know, however, that that brevet rank carries with it pay and emoluments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. But no command.

Mr. STEVENS. No command, of course. All that I am aware of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a question of order. I ask, what has all this to do with the bill before the committee?

Mr. STEVENS. That is what I am asking. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I am asking, for I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust the gentleman from Connecticut will permit the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed. I desire to say a word in regard to the matter of the lieutenant generality myself, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been so very swift to proclaim, in advance, that he will vote against giving the title of lieutenant general.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall not withdraw my objection, because both gentlemen are old enough to know better. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman is right, and I owe an apology to the House for the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am much obliged to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope, therefore, that the bill will pass without much further objection.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to say a word to-day in regard to this matter; but this debate, after what the gentleman from Illinois has said, has taken so wide a range that I feel bound to say a few words to the committee. I am very much surprised that the gentleman from Illinois should have made the broad and general attack he has made this morning on the railroad system of this country and on its management. I do not propose now—this is not the time—to enter into the question of the merits or demerits of the railroad lines between this city and New York. The House has seen fit, as the gentleman says, to adopt to-day a resolution, in a perfect spirit of independence, (and I do not mean here to notice the attack which he made on the character of the last House; there are others here who should do that,) instructing a special committee to inquire into the management of those lines, and we may, in time, have a report on that subject.

But when a gentleman gets up here from a State which has more largely than any other in the Union benefited by the railroad system, which has been developed more thoroughly and entirely than any other part of the world by that system, and denounces it in the manner in which he has denounced it this morning, I must say that I cannot help expressing my surprise and regret to find such sentiments coming from such a quarter. Illinois is covered with a network of railroads. Eastern capitalists, capitalists from abroad, and capitalists from the middle States, have sent out millions and millions and tens and scores of millions of dollars to that State, which have been invested in advancing its progress and increasing its wealth, giving dignity and power to that State. While that has been so, we have a Representative coming from that State indulging in remarks of the most extraordinary character in regard to the great system of railroads in this country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman from New York would be good enough to state to what portion of my remarks he is now alluding. Where did I denounce the whole system of railroads of the country?

Mr. PRUYN. I appeal to the members of the House, to every man here, whether the gentleman from Illinois did not indulge in a most bitter and indiscriminate attack on the railroad system of this country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman heard me undoubtedly, and can state to the committee what portion of my remarks denouged generally the system of railroads.

Mr. PRUYN. I refer to the general manner in which the gentleman spoke of the railroad system of the country; the attempt made by them, as he said, to rob and fleece the Government, their arbitrary character, and the manner in which they were managed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that the House is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on a special order, which is the Post Office appropriation bill, and that we are not in committee for general discussion. I call the gentleman from New York to order, as his remarks are not germane to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. PRUYN. That will depend on the question of fact, to be determined at the Clerk's table by the Chair, whether the Post Office appropriation bill was made a special order before we went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would be glad if the gentleman from New York would proceed to answer my question. When he has done so, I hope that I will not be denied an opportunity of replying to his remarks concerning what I have said.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate can only proceed in order.

Mr. PRUYN. I understand the question to be presented to the House to be this: we are passing the appropriation for paying the railroads of this country for services which they have rendered the Post Office Department. The gentleman from Illinois virtually took the ground that they ought not to be paid, and that therefore the appropriation ought not to be made; at least, that the service has been so imperfectly performed—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman could not understand me as taking that ground. I suppose that the gentleman will permit me. I state—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will bear me out—that when the House went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, believing the bill open to general debate, I made my remarks particularly in regard to the railroad between Washington and New York. I remarked that some of the railroads had swindled the Government during the war; and in proof of that remark I can refer the gentleman to a report of one of the committees of the last Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call the gentleman to order, and insist on the enforcement of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen must confine themselves to the question before the committee.

Mr. PRUYN. Am I right in supposing that the question is in reference to the payment of railroads services? Is that the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to the bill, and cannot go into a general discussion of the railroad policy of the country.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Illinois to take the ground, and he now repeats it, that the railroads of the country—he speaks of them in the mass, and not only of a few—have been engaged in swindling the Government during the war.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said that many of the railroads which had dealt with the Government had swindled it. I repeat it, and I stand by it.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman qualifies his former remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. PRUYN. He talks now about a few of the railroads. It is with corporations as with individuals, and I have no doubt that you will find some railroads behaving badly, and getting more than they were entitled to. But I venture to say that in no part of the world have greater efforts been made by corporations to meet the unexpected demands made upon them by the Government than by the railroad companies of this country; and that in no part of the world has the compensation paid ever been less. I am speaking from some personal knowledge. I do not claim, and I do not mean to claim, that these companies have been immaculate; but I do mean to protest against this wholesale denunciation on this floor of the railroad corporations of the country because a few of them, in the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois, have attempted to swindle the Government. I express my surprise that a gentleman coming from that State which is covered with a network of railroads should take the position he has taken.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What was the decision of the Chair upon the point I made?

The CHAIRMAN. That the gentleman from New York must confine himself to the question under debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point that the gentleman is not confining himself to the question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from New York is taking too wide a range. He will please conform his remarks to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PRUYN. I would like to know again of the Chair whether we are not considering the question whether we will vote this appropriation to railroads to pay for their services performed for the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must submit to the decision of the Chair, or take an appeal from that decision.

Mr. PRUYN. I claim that if I am out of order, the gentleman shall put his point in writing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am merely calling the gentleman to order for speaking, not to the bill of the committee, but to the general railroad system of the United States, and particularly to the Central railroad of the State of New York.

Mr. PRUYN. I have inquired of the Chair twice, and I now inquire a third time, if we are not passing upon the question whether the railroads shall not be paid for the postal services they have rendered to the Government? That subject brought up the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 8, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 8.

WASHBURN,] and as he opened this subject, I claim that I have a right to meet him. If the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] wanted to object to this line of debate, he should have done so when it was opened by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection can be interposed at any time, and the point of order raised. The Chair has decided that the general course of the remarks of the member is out of order.

Mr. PRUYN. May I, with great respect, inquire of the Chair again, what is the point we are discussing? Am I not right in supposing it to be the question of paying these roads for the postal service they have performed for the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that it will be in order to discuss the general manner in which the railroads of the country have discharged their duties in carrying the mails for the Government; but when the gentleman enters into general debate as to all the doings of the railroads through the country, the Chair decides that it is not in order.

Mr. PRUYN. I will confine myself within the rule which the Chair has laid down.

The gentleman from Illinois claims that the services for which this bill seeks to pay the railroads have been imperfectly discharged in some cases, and that in other cases the charges have been exorbitant. I do not propose to enter into the general question of the management of railroads, but I will restrict myself within the range the Chairman imposes, though the gentleman from Illinois was permitted to go quite outside of that range.

I have very little more to say in regard to this matter. I rose principally to repel the attack made by the gentleman from Illinois upon the great body of railroad corporations in this country, and to express my regret that when this question of appropriation came up, he, a Representative from Illinois, a State covered all over with railroads which have done so much to develop its resources and wealth and to elevate its character, should have been the person from whom this attack proceeded. I have no doubt that the postal services rendered by the railroads of this country are the cheapest services rendered the Government in the country; and that most of the railroads have performed the service for the Government for a price for which they would not perform it for individuals.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] alluded to the Central railroad of New York. I am connected with that road, and have been for many years, and I venture to say that there is no class of commercial people in the State of New York for whom the New York Central road would render the services which they render for the Government for the same amount of money; and that were it not that the mail has been carried simply as a matter of public interest and convenience, they would not for the remuneration carry it a single day longer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know all the services the New York Central road has rendered to the Government, but I know it has rendered a service to the Democratic party at my expense.

Mr. COX. I call the gentleman to order. I insist that gentlemen shall quit talking about the Democratic party.

Mr. PRUYN. All these allusions come from the other side of the House. We do not mean to go into them; but if gentlemen choose to open the ball by making such allusions, we shall try to stand upon our ground and meet them.

I can only say that when the gentleman made the remark he did a while ago, he did it in ignorance of certain facts, and in defiance of the open and expressed declarations of some of the strongest and warmest political men of the State of New York, among them his friend, the gentleman from Onondaga, [Mr. DAVIS], sitting over the way.

Now, sir, I have been drawn into saying much more than I meant to say; and I only wish to add that I hope the House, in passing upon this question of appropriation for postal services rendered by the railroads of the country, will do it without reference to the indiscriminate censure heaped upon them by the gentleman from Illinois, but will pay them at least a reasonable amount for the services which they may have rendered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Since the House has heard the speech of the gentleman from New York, which, of course, was for the most part entirely outside of this bill—which, it seems, has been made a special order—I should be glad, if there be no objection, to have an opportunity to reply to him.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe this debate has gone about far enough, and I must object. I hope we shall pass the bill now, and then I will move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for a general talk.

Mr. PRUYN. We will have it out some other time.

The Clerk read the following clause:

For miscellaneous payments, $200,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend that clause by adding to it the following:

Provided, That nothing shall be appropriated to carrying the mails from Cairo to Centralia, or Chicago, or anywhere in Illinois; and that a special committee be appointed to ascertain how many failures of the trains there were in Illinois from December 25, 1863, to January 5, 1864.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is hardly in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it is perfectly in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I think I shall have to object to its being in order.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman cannot object. It is clearly in order.

Mr. STEVENS. It may be pertinent to the speeches we have heard, but not to this item of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will give his attention to the clause, he will see the relevancy of the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. We have passed that part of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, no; I am always in time.

Mr. STEVENS. The previous item makes appropriation for carrying the mails. There is nothing whatever appropriated in this clause for that purpose. This is for miscellaneous items, wholly independent from carrying the mails. That is provided for in the earlier part of the bill. The gentleman's amendment to raise a committee might have been in order there, but I submit that it is not in order here.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is only losing time in pressing his point of order. I am too old a parliamentarian not to find means to accomplish my purpose. I can offer the amendment to the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I submit to the decision of the Chair; but I wish the Chair would decide what is out of order in the amendment; if the latter clause, I will waive that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. BROOKS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair in order to say—

Mr. STEVENS. The appeal is not debatable, so the gentleman cannot say it.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I will withdraw the appeal; and shall renew the amendment when we reach the next clause of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection. I should like to hear the gentleman from New York state the reasons why he, a Representative of the great metropolis of the country, wishes to deprive the people of Illinois of their mail facilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that debate is in order without offering an amendment. Debate has not been closed on the bill.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I now submit my amendment to that section.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not disturb the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. What I have to say seriously is, that I admit the embarrassments which have existed in carrying the mails between New York and Washington, from the inclemency of the season, and from other causes. These misfortunes have resulted from the burning of a bridge over the Schuylkill river, and the freezing up of the Susquehanna, an occurrence which has happened regularly for twenty-five years past, and probably from the foundation of the world. I see by the newspapers that in consequence of the same kind of weather in Illinois, frost, and snow in some quarters, and a general destruction of the means of locomotion, the breaking down of locomotives in consequence of the frost, and the sudden contraction of the iron, there was no connection between Cairo and Centralia, or between Cairo and Chicago, or on many of the roads radiating from Chicago, from the 25th of December to the latest dates we have from there by telegraph—January the 4th or 5th; and I have just as much reason to insist on a special committee to investigate the whole affair of carrying the mails on the railroads in Illinois, as the gentleman from Illinois and his friends have to demand an examination into the carrying of the mails between here and New York.

I voted as I did to-day on this subject in order to refer the subject to the Post Office Committee or to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was a proper subject for investigation by the Post Office Committee, if it was a postal road that was to be established. It was a proper subject for investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs, if it was a military road that was to be established. It is unparliamentary, it is irregular, it is extraordinary, this introduction of special committees on any and every occasion when a gentleman wishes to be appointed, whether a Speaker wills it or not, chairman of a special committee. It is beneath the dignity of this House, instituted to legislate on the gravest subjects, in a time of civil war, to be taking business from regular organizations and regular committees, and to stoop to the appointing a special committee on the management of railroads between New York and Washington, or between Cairo and Centralia, or between Centralia and Chicago. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICE, of Maine, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had instructed him to report the same back without amendments, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) the first business in order being the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, in June, 1858, a comparatively unknown man uttered in the State-house at Springfield, Illinois, a sentiment which is already historical. Its philosophy, its profound sagacity, its prophetic prescience, its unparalleled boldness and honesty, were characteristic of the man, who, then obscure, has become already, today, the foremost character in American history. The sentiment was this:

"A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe that this Government cannot permanently exist half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved; I do not expect the house to fall; but I expect it will cease to be divided."

This, the first emphatic enunciation of the philosophical fact of the antagonism between liberty and slavery, the eternal and "irrepressible" conflict between them, electrified the country, and made Abraham Lincoln President of the United States.

The moment the fact is recognized that liberty and slavery are antagonistic, and that there can be no peace between them—that our country, all of it, must pass into the dark night of slavery, or all of it emerge into the clear light of freedom—all loyal, patriotic men become at once anti-slavery men, abolitionists.

Such I avow myself here, to-day, and I shall deem it a proud distinction if I can merit the name by aiding in bringing about the entire abolition of slavery in my suffering country.

And as, when in the palmy days of the Roman republic, the people came to feel, by an instinctive conviction, that Carthage must be destroyed that Rome might live, so, to-day, the American people feel that slavery must die that liberty and the Union may live. "Delenda est Carthago," became then the motto of every loyal, patriotic Roman. "Down with slavery" is becoming the motto of every loyal, patriotic American.

As Roman constancy, courage, and persistence finally triumphed over Carthage, so will American constancy, courage, and determination triumph over slavery.

When the Son of God proclaimed a common Father and the universal brotherhood of man, He enunciated the great moral principle which brought on the irrepressible conflict with slavery. It is difficult, it seems to me, for a man to recognize fully the truth of His teaching, in the light of this rebellion, without becoming an opponent of slavery. Just to the extent that Christianity prevails, slavery will disappear. The glorious light of Christianity must fade from the earth, or slavery cease. It is a relic of a barbarous and a savage age, and, thank God, it is melting rapidly away before the light of the nineteenth century.

THE PROGRESS OF LIBERTY.

It would be a most interesting task to retrace the footprints of liberty, amidst the dust and rubbish which have gathered over the history of the past; to follow the oftentimes obliterated pathway by which, since Christ's sermon on the mount, freedom regulated by law has been developed into its present majestic and grand proportions. I hesitate not to affirm that all that there is which is valuable in republican and free institutions has its foundation in the sublime morality and broad humanity of the Bible. The glorious theme of man's struggle, through the ages, for liberty is yet to be written. Historians have told us much of courts and camps, of the changes of dynasties, of battles by land and on the sea; but who among them has traced the history of man's progress, and his struggles, through the ages, for "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?" This history, even as presented by that nation and race most interesting to us—the English—has yet to be fully written. The historian has yet to write who has gone back and recorded for us the dawn of freedom among the early Saxons, its memorable triumph on the field of Runnymede, its struggles through the reigns of the Henrys and the Edwards, its fierce and bloody contest with Charles the First, the Roundhead against the Cavalier; thence to the Petition of Right, pausing with sad steps at the grave of Hampden and the scaffolds of Russell and Algernon Sidney; thence to the revolution of 1688, the gradual but sure advance to the noble efforts of Fox and Erskine and Curran to secure freedom of speech, liberty of the press, and trial by jury, down to the crowning glory of the English constitution, when Lord Mansfield electrified the island of Great Britain by proclaiming in the case of the negro Somerset, "that slaves cannot breathe in England."

God speed the hour when the Chief Justice of our land may truthfully announce the same fact. Then, and not till then, would I have crowned the dome of this Capitol with the statue of Liberty. The great English bard who expiated a life of follies by giving himself a martyr to Greece, has said:

"For freedom's battle, once begun,
Bequeathed by bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won."

The historian who writes the story of man's progress from slavery and barbarism to Christian civilization and liberty, will find no more interesting page than that which is now being filled with the struggle in which we are engaged; none where the contest between liberty and slavery has been more clearly defined; none upon a grander theater; none where the combatants, by their numbers, genius, ability, and heroism, have given more dignity and sublimity to the contest.

WEAPONS OF FREEDOM.

When, in 1858, Abraham Lincoln uttered the philosophic truth that freedom and slavery could not permanently exist together—that our country would become all free or all slave—he did not anticipate any but a moral conflict. The weapons by which he expected freedom to triumph were the weapons of truth and free discussion. Free speech, a free press, reason, the schoolmaster, the sermon, the lecture, the printing-press, the telegraph, the ballot: these were the agencies, the weapons, by which the battle was to be fought. It was with the ballot, and not with bullets, the victory was expected to be won. The victory was won by these peaceful agencies in the election of Abraham Lincoln as President. Slavery, conscious that it could not stand free discussion, that it must be destroyed if free speech and a free press were tolerated, appealed from the ballot-box to the sword, and brought upon the country this terrible war.

SLAVERY MUST DIE BY THE LAWS OF WAR.

Slavery having plunged the nation into this war, it is fit that it should die by the laws of war. Slavery stands before the world to-day guilty of all the calamities of our country. Every dollar expended, every suffering endured, every drop of blood spilled, every wound, and every death, on every battle-field and in every hospital, is the price we pay for the existence and toleration of American slavery.

It is to-day a rebel and a traitor. Let us declare it an outlaw under our Constitution and laws.

There has never been a day since our existence as a nation when slavery was loyal to the Constitution and the Union. Now an open enemy, striking at the heart of the Republic, it has always been a plotting, stealthy, secret traitor, undermining the Constitution, and sapping the foundations of our liberties.

INDICTMENT AGAINST SLAVERY.

The counts of the indictment against slavery, were I to recapitulate its outrages and its wrongs, from the organization of the Government down, would swell to volumes.

The effects of slavery in retarding our national growth and prosperity are apparent at a glance.

The finest portion of our country, with the richest soil, situated in the most genial climate, has been blighted by this curse. Watered by navigable streams, nearer to the sun, with every element of prosperity and wealth showered upon it, yet poor, sparsely settled, with neither thrift, nor comfort, nor commerce, nor manufactures, nor culture, nor art, nor intelligence; all because labor was not free. While sterile, rocky, cold, bleak, barren New England, under the influence of free labor, smiles with abundant harvests, every valley blooms like a garden, every hill shelters a thriving village; with every element of comfort, with a commerce whitening every sea, with skilled and intelligent labor which sends its manufactures to the uttermost parts of the earth. Why is this? Because liberty dwells among the mountains of New England, and slavery blackens and desolates the sunny plains of the South.

In the one you find the happy home, the school-house, the church, the lyceum, the newspaper, the railroad, the telegraph; and everywhere domestic comfort and domestic virtue, refinement, culture, the arts, taste, Christian civilization in its highest forms. In the other you find the great plantation, the slave-pen, squalor, poverty, misery; in place of the school-house, the slave market, where children, boys and girls, are bought and sold; ignorance, brutality; without art, without literature, without inventions or labor-saving machinery; everywhere slavery operating as a moral blight, an intellectual extinguisher, reducing rapidly a once noble people into barbarism. Such are the results of slavery. These results as naturally follow free labor, and the degradation of labor, as that the summer produces fruit and the winter destroys it.

All history demonstrates that the feet that are fettered and the hands that are manacled cannot contend with those that are free. The hand that is enslaved produces no work of merit. The brain that conceives and the hand that executes all great things must be free.

God has established the great law of compensation, that true national greatness can never grow up from wrong and wickedness, and we behold to-day in our country its most striking illustration.

All history teaches that ignorance, vice, pauperism, and barbarism are the natural and inevitable results of the degradation of labor. It is quite time to cut loose this millstone from about our necks.

SLAVERY BECAME MASTER OF OUR GOVERNMENT.

Slavery having in an unfortunate moment been tolerated by the framers of our Constitution, under the mistaken belief that it would be but a temporary evil, soon aspired to and became the master of the Government. Having intrenched itself in the very citadel of political power, conscious of its inherent weakness, it demanded additional territory for its expansion; first Louisiana, then Florida, then Texas. These territories, vast enough for an empire, having been secured, slavery then demanded the repeal of the Missouri line, that she might carry her curse North as well as South and West.

Why need I remind the people of the perfidious repeal of the Missouri compromise, showing the slaveholder's promise to be as sacred as a gambler's word or a secessionist's oath? The story of the sublime struggle in Kansas, between fraud and violence and outrage on one side, and heroic firmness on the other, has not faded from the memory of the people. Her prairies, red with the blood of the martyrs to liberty, her valleys, black with the cinders of her burned and devastated towns and villages, attest alike the devotion of her people to liberty and the savage barbarity of her enemies. All honor to Kansas! She was indeed the rock against which the turbulent waves of violence rolled in vain. Single-handed she successfully resisted the slave power backed by the Federal Government.

Up to this period of this struggle, the career of the slaveholders in their lust of domination had met with no serious check. Slavery was absolute on the bench of the Supreme Court; it dictated in the national councils; it furnished the Presidents, or designated the most base, subservient tool it could purchase among its northern sycophants to occupy the Executive Mansion. It was a ruler in the Halls of Congress. The Army and the Navy, with West Point and the Naval School as its nurseries—the training from which yet lingers—were its right and left hand to carry out its purposes. The national treasure, collected in large proportion at the North, was expended mainly at the South and to fill the pockets of slaveholders. The qualifications for your representatives abroad were fealty to slavery. Every new Territory was filled with the minions of this slave power, and was as regularly trained up to the interests of slavery as the protégés of Jefferson Davis in military life were trained to his will.

QUESTIONS OF PEACE AND WAR, OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC POLICY, CONTROLLED AND SHAPED BY SLAVEHOLDERS.

The slaveholder held the purse and the sword; he was king at the White House, a ruler here in this Hall, a despot in the Senate, and everywhere a tyrant.

Such was the position of the slaveholder in 1858.

SLAVERY HAD REVOLUTIONIZED THE GOVERNMENT AND DESTROYED THE PRINCIPLES OF LIBERTY.

Meanwhile slavery had revolutionized the Government. The great principles of Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence had ceased to have practical existence in a large part of the Union. Liberty of speech, freedom of the press, and trial by jury had disappeared in the slave States. Indeed, that portion of the so-called Republic had ceased to be a government of law, and had become a government of a tyrannic, cruel oligarchy, more odious, despicable, and cruel than any on earth. There was no redress for any outrage, however cruel, if perpetrated in behalf and at the behest of slavery. The vengeance of the slaveholder against the man who spoke or published in behalf of liberty was sharp, speedy, and unrelenting. The bowie-knife and the bludgeon, the halter, and even the stake, were the instruments of violence and torture resorted to by every petty lynch judge who found any bold enough to question the divinity of the "peculiar institution." In the slave States of this Union a freeman had no rights which a slaveholder felt bound to respect. In those States the Constitution had disappeared. I say, then, that slavery had established a revolution, overturned a republican form of government, and established a despotism in its place.

The degeneracy and barbarism produced by slavery are strikingly illustrated by Virginia. Before the rebellion the chief source of her wealth was in the cargoes and coffes of men, women, and children she raised and sent to the Gulf States for sale. Some years she exported her forty and fifty thousand; and this was done without a blush in the grand old Commonwealth of Virginia—the land of Washington, the mother of statesmen!

Let us pause a moment, Mr. Chairman, and contemplate the saddest spectacle of all this war—Virginia as she is to-day. She was worthy of her early preëminence. Her early history was brilliant indeed. Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Madison, and Marshall, all men of whom any nation might be proud. There is something grand and majestic in the physical conformation of the old Commonwealth. With the Alleghanies and the Blue Ridge running through her entire extent, she seems fashioned for the abode of freemen. When we remember that her greatest writer penned the Declaration of Independence and the Ordinance of 1787, and that he declared that in a contest between her slaveholders and their slaves the Almighty had no attribute which would take sides with the master; and when we look upon her to-day, and see to what slavery has reduced the proud old Commonwealth, it is indeed the saddest spectacle of the war. She is being purged as with fire; she will pass through this agony, and come out of it restored, emancipated, disenthralled, and regenerated. Once more shall she be hailed as the mother of States—free States—and statesmen. Mount Vernon and Monticello will again become the Meccas of the American patriot. Through the dark clouds which now envelop her the bow of promise shall reappear; that bow shall rest upon liberty. When she shall have passed through this agony, and shall arise freed and regenerated, when every petty tyrant shall have been dethroned, then will her stern old motto, "Sic semper tyrannis," have a new and glorious significance.

In view, then, of all the curses which slavery has inflicted upon the country, I impeach American slavery before the American people and their Congress, and demand whether it shall still live?

I charge slavery with treason and with murder; I charge it with the murder of every Union soldier who has been sacrificed since the rebels fired upon Fort Sumter; I charge it with the assassination of Ellsworth and Lyon and Baker and McCook, and the whole army of martyrs who have been perfidiously assassinated by slaveholders since they began the rebellion; I charge it with a conspiracy to undermine and subvert the liberties and Constitution of my country, to erect a despotism upon its ruins; I charge slavery with the death of all those who have fallen in this war. It has dug the half million of graves for patriots and rebels made by this war; and those who sleep there would, but for this cursed institution, to-day be living in peace and fraternity.

In the name, then, of those dead, in the name of the widows and orphans thus created, in the name of our country which it has desolated, in the name of the Constitution which it has sought to overthrow, I demand the abolition of American slavery.

YOU CAN HAVE NO PEACE WHILE SLAVERY EXISTS.

You can have no permanent peace while slavery lives. A truce you might have, possibly, until it could recover its power; but peace, never. Your contest with it is to the death. Your implacable enemy now reels and staggers. Strike the decisive blow. You could not if you would, and you ought not if you could, make terms of compromise with slavery. You have abolished it at this capital. You have forever prohibited it in all your Territories. Your Government has hung a man for participating in the slave trade. You have admitted West Virginia free. You have acknowledged the independence of Hayti. You have enlisted, and are enlisting, African soldiers; they have carried your banner bravely and triumphantly on many hard-fought fields. You have pledged your faith to them, to the world, and to God, that they shall be free. You have crowned the dome of your Capitol with Liberty. At your call Missouri is throwing off the incubus of slavery. Maryland shouts back, through the ballot-box, her joyous answer that she, too, is to be free. Delaware, Tennessee, Arkansas, Texas, and Louisiana will not linger. Your President, in a proclamation of emancipation, which, while it has revolutionized the public sentiment and the action of Europe, has secured victory to our arms, has proclaimed liberty and emancipation throughout the territory in rebellion.

Here, then, we are on the eve of universal emancipation. We cannot go back, and we must not halt. Slavery must die. The sooner it dies, the sooner we shall have peace.

HOW SHALL SLAVERY BE EXTERMINATED?

First, I reply, in the border States, by the action of the States themselves. This action will be speedy and decisive.

Second. In all the territory in rebellion, slavery has been already substantially abolished by the proclamation of emancipation. Confirm by Congress this proclamation by prohibiting its reestablishment, and abolish it in that part of the rebel States not included in the proclamation.

Third. Slavery being thus everywhere abolished, amend the Constitution, prohibiting its reestablishment or existence in every part of the United States.

Has Congress the power to confirm, sanction, and carry out the proclamation of emancipation, and prohibit slavery in all that portion of the United States designated therein?

WHAT POWER HAS CONGRESS OVER SLAVERY IN TIME OF WAR?

I claim that the Government has the power in time of war, as a war measure, to abolish slavery wherever and whenever it may be necessary to secure the success of the war.

It is a principle in the interpretation of statutes and constitutions, familiar to lawyers, that, to determine their meaning, you may look into and consider their preamble. This is, indeed, usually the key to the instrument. It states the object sought to be attained by the statute; and it would be strange, if the preamble recites that the Constitution was ordained to accomplish a certain specified purpose, if the power to accomplish that purpose is not found in the Constitution. Now, the preamble to the Constitution recites that the people, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty, &c., ordain and establish this Constitution," &c.

For the purpose of securing these objects a Government was established, clothed with powers adequate, as was supposed, to accomplish these purposes. Now, if a permanent and perfect union between free and slave States has been demonstrated to be impossible, may not the obstacle to such union be removed? If justice cannot be established while slavery exists, shall not slavery cease? Has Congress the constitutional power to insure domestic tranquillity? I submit to the candid and thoughtful men of all parties whether, in the light of the history of the past, the endless controversies and dissensions, from the Missouri question down to the civil war in Kansas, the riots and outrages caused by slavery, culminating in this terrible rebellion and bloody war, whether domestic tranquillity is attainable while slavery exists? If not, may not this domestic tranquillity be insured by removing the disturbing cause? If, indeed, there is no medicine for this evil, if this vicious element may not be removed, then the founders of the Government established the Constitution to insure tranquillity without the power to accomplish the object.

Fourth. Among the enumerated objects of the Constitution was to provide for the public defense. Assuming the fact that slavery is a source of weakness and danger to us, and would afford aid and strength to a foreign or domestic enemy, can we provide for the common defense by removing the danger? If a city charter vested in the corporate body the power to provide for the common defense, and a magazine of powder should be established in a populous district, would any lawyer doubt the power of the corporation to cause its removal? If a dangerous and contagious disease should spring up, would the power to cause its removal be questioned? If a pestilence-breeding nuisance existed, could it be removed and its cause be prohibited?

Again, the Constitution was ordained to promote the general welfare, and to secure to us and to our posterity the blessings of liberty. Suppose experience has demonstrated that we cannot have prosperity, nor the blessings of liberty, without extirpating slavery. Suppose the census tables demonstrate that slavery is the great obstacle to our progress; that free labor will produce double that of slave labor; that with free labor you will have national prosperity, wealth, every element of greatness; that with freedom you will have education, arts, science, civilization, religion; while with slavery you have ignorance, brutality, vice, barbarism: can we, under a Constitution formed with the avowed object of promoting the general welfare, promote it by abolishing slavery? Suppose it to be demonstrated that liberty and slavery are incompatible, and that unless you destroy slavery, slavery will destroy freedom and republican government, can you secure the blessings of liberty to yourselves and your posterity by destroying slavery?

THE POWER TO GOVERN THAT PORTION OF THE UNION IN REBELLION MUST BE IN THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT SO LONG AS REBELLION EXISTS.

There is to-day no government in that portion of the United States in rebellion, except the national Government. Until it is restored to the Union, the power to govern it must exist somewhere. Where is it? I say, in the President and in Congress.

That is a part of our country. The United States—the nation—has guaranteed to it a republican form of government. None exists there to-day. Jefferson Davis has established a despotism there. That despotism must be crushed, and a republican government established. Everything needful to that end the President and Congress may rightfully do. The power to establish all needful rules and regulations, and make all laws necessary to the restoration of a government republican in form, must exist in the national Government.

I do not choose to theorize about State suicide, nor whether the rebel States are in the condition, in every respect, of Territories. I call attention to the fact that there is no government in this rebel territory, except the despotism of Jefferson Davis. There is no State government there. There is no republican government there. The loyal citizens of that part of the Union call upon us to fulfill the constitutional guarantee of giving them a republican form of government.

Whatever it is necessary to do, to execute in their favor this constitutional guarantee, Congress and the President may rightfully do. The right to crush armed resistance to the Constitution and laws, and for Congress to make and the President to execute such laws as will result in the establishment of a republican government, is then clear. But this right to coerce into subjection, and govern until obedience and loyalty shall resume their sway, all territory and States in rebellion, is not left to inference, nor is it dependent only on those parts of the Constitution to which attention has already been called. The Constitution also provides that "Congress shall have power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare."

Congress also has power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Now, the President is an officer of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of its armies, and it is his duty to suppress rebellion, repel invasion, and maintain the Constitution everywhere in the Union, and carry out the guarantee to each State of a republican form of government; and this he is to do, when necessary, by force, by war, subject to the laws of war; and Congress has full power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry out, and into full execution, these war powers of the Government, including the well-established

BELLIGERENT RIGHT OF EMANCIPATING SLAVES.

If slavery is the corner-stone of the rebellion, can not that corner-stone be constitutionally knocked out? If slavery is the cause of the war, giving strength to our enemies; if it feeds and clothes their armies, and keeps them in the field, and enables them to keep up their power; and if the President, or Congress, or both acting together, by freeing them, can deprive the rebels of this power, and bring their freed slaves to our side, and thus provide for the common defense, and thus restore the Union and a republican government to the loyal men of the rebel States, is not the right to do this clear and indisputable? If we have not this right, then is the Government without the means of self-preservation.

The Constitution provides that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." Congress has the power to do everything necessary to make good that guarantee. If the emancipation of slaves in the rebel States will tend to the establishment of a republican form of government in the States in rebellion, who can deny the power to emancipate? The government, so called, existing de facto, in the States in rebellion, is in antagonism to the republican government the Constitution requires the nation to guaranty. It is the right and the duty of the Government to destroy that usurped and rebellious de facto government, and establish a republican government in its place. In accomplishing this, if slavery stands in the way, may it not be removed out of the way? Congress, under this constitutional provision, has the power, and it is its duty, to make war upon the anti-republican government now usurping power in the rebel States. It has all the power to make that war effective. Has the Government the right to make war, without the right to use the means to make the war effective? Can the Government declare war, and is this a mere barren right, a brutum fulmen? No, this Government, having the right to carry on the war, possesses all the powers known to civilized nations to make war effective, and among these powers is the right to emancipate slaves.

I ask gentlemen this question. Jeff. Davis has made war upon our country, attempted to set up upon our soil a rebellious government, attacked our capital, and now holds a portion of these States under a despotic tyranny. In making war upon him to subdue him, to reestablish our authority, and fulfill the guarantee of a republican form of government, can our Government do all that one nation can do when at war with another under the rules of war? Surely this will not be denied. This brings us to the inquiry whether the emancipation of the slaves of the enemy is or is not a recognized mode of carrying on modern warfare. Let us see. The end we are seeking to accomplish is to crush the rebellion. The abolition of slavery tends directly to the accomplishment of that end, and as effectually as to subdue the rebel armies in the field. Without their slaves the rebel armies could not long exist. Emancipation not only deprives the rebels of the means of supporting their armies, but it is the most efficient means of bringing the force and power of four millions of people to our side.

Now, the end we are seeking, to wit, the destruction of the rebel power, being legitimate, and "within the scope of the Constitution," to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall, all means which are appropriate and plainly adapted to the end, and which are not prohibited by the Constitution, are lawful. (4 Wheaton's Rep., 421.) I assert, without fear of contradiction, that the emancipation of the slaves of an enemy is a well-recognized belligerent right, and would not be questioned by any well-informed person if we were at war with Spain, Brazil, or any other nation holding slaves. Has not our Government the same belligerent rights against the infamous traitor Davis as it would have against a recognized nation? Are the rebels less public enemies because they are traitors also? Can we do that to a public enemy which we cannot do to a public enemy and a traitor? In the case of the Hiawatha, it has been distinctly decided by the Supreme Court that the United States have all the belligerent rights against the rebels. If, then, the emancipation of slaves is a belligerent right, that right exists in the Government; it may be exercised by the President, as it has been by the proclamation of emancipation. It exists in Congress, to be exercised, if expedient, by emancipating slaves and prohibiting slavery in all the territory in rebellion. The right to emancipate slaves has been so generally recognized as a belligerent right that it will scarcely be questioned. This power was exercised by Great Britain in the revolutionary war, and in the war of 1812; and the right to exercise it was admitted by General Washington and Mr. Jefferson, and not controverted by any.

Mr. Jefferson says Virginia lost thirty thousand slaves under Cornwallis, and if the slaves had been taken "to give them freedom it would have been right."

The statement and argument of John Quincy Adams on this subject has never been successfully answered:

"I lay this down as the law of nations. I say that military authority takes, for the time, the place of all municipal institutions, and SLAVERY AMONG THE REST; and that, under that state of things, so far from its being true that the States where slavery exists have the exclusive management of the subject, not only the President of the United States, but the Commander of the Army, HAS POWER TO ORDER THE UNIVERSAL EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVES."

"From the instant that the slaveholding States become the theater of a war, civil, servile, or foreign, from that instant the war powers of Congress extend to interference with the institution of slavery, in every way in which it can be interfered with, from a claim of indemnity for slaves taken or destroyed, to the cession of States burdened with slavery to a foreign Power." "It is a war power. I say it is a war power; and when your country is actually in war, whether it be a war of invasion or a war of insurrection, Congress has power to carry on the war, and must carry it on, according to the laws of war; and by the laws of war an invaded country has all its laws and municipal institutions swept by the board, and martial power takes the place of them. When two hostile armies are set in martial array, the commanders of both armies have power to emancipate all the slaves in the invaded territory."

The great error in the public mind on this subject arises from applying the provisions designed to protect citizens in times of peace to traitors in time of war.

The provision that no person shall be deprived of life without due process of law does not make it illegal or unconstitutional to kill rebels on the field of battle. Neither do the provisions in regard to the security of property, or claim to service, make it unconstitutional, under the war power, to deprive rebels of their slaves. A claim to service for years, as an apprentice, is discharged by the apprentice's entering the Army. Congress may discharge from this service in order to raise troops. Congress may emancipate all slaves to raise troops. If it can discharge a claim to service for years under the war power, can it not discharge a claim for service for life? If the nation is entitled to the military service of all able-bodied men, including apprentices held to service for years, is it not entitled to the service of all black or white men held for life?

Can Congress, by law, discharge one and not the other?

As against the right to military service, is the claim of the master to the service of a slave better or more sacred than that of a master to the service of an apprentice, or of a father to the service of his child? The Government can take my son and your apprentice; can it not take your slave? In case of a foreign war, could not the Government conscript every able-bodied slave? Can it not do the same in a domestic war against traitors? Then it seems clear to demonstration that the Government may emancipate slaves.

The power, then, being clear, in the name of liberty and of justice and humanity, let it be exercised. Proclaim "liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof."

Let us build upon this rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against us.

I cannot close without offering my tribute of homage to that great man who has given to the institution of slavery the hardest blows it has ever received. Let Abraham Lincoln finish the great work he has begun.

The great objects of his life are to crush the rebellion and eradicate slavery. His ambition is to live on the page of history as the restorer of the Union, the emancipator of his country. For these great ends he has labored and toiled through difficulties and obstacles fully known only to himself and to God.

The year that has just closed will live as the year of the proclamation of emancipation. This act the President declared was sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity; and he invoked for it the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God. It will mark an era in modern civilization as clearly as the Declaration of Independence, or the acquisition of Magna Charta. By history it will be regarded as a great act of humanity and justice. As a matter of State policy, its wisdom has already been vindicated. This proclamation, by presenting our national struggle as a clearly-defined contest between liberty and slavery, changed the attitude of Europe toward us. Under its influence and the victories achieved under its auspices, all fear of foreign intervention has disappeared. Since the day of its issue no more Floridas have sailed from British waters. England's broad arrow arrests the rebel rams being fitted out in her harbors. Louis Napoleon, following the example of Great Britain, arrests the rebel gunboats in the waters of France. Lord Lyons now rises with alacrity to warn Mr. Seward of a rebel plot in Canada.

With liberty and union thus written by the President's own hand upon our national banner, we have had Gettysburg, Port Hudson, Vicksburg, Knoxville, and Chattanooga.

It has been the fortune of the President to have his leading measures, however severely censured at the time of their adoption, always approved within a twelvemonth after their execution. The emancipation proclamation and employment of negroes as soldiers are striking examples. Let those who deny his statesmanship, or who question his sagacity, note this fact. His magnanimity has no parallel. He has borne censure and denunciation for acts for which others were responsible, with a generosity which has extorted from his rivals the declaration, "Of all men, Mr. Lincoln is the most unselfish." The great fault of his administration, the too tardy removal of incompetent men, has arisen from a scrupulous care to be just.

I ask the ardent and impatient friends of freedom to put implicit faith in Abraham Lincoln. Remember he lives for the restoration of the Union and the abolition of slavery. If you deem him slow, or if you think he has made mistakes, remember how often time has vindicated his wisdom.

One of the most striking and gratifying vindications of the policy and character of President Lincoln is to be found in the reply of Gasparin and his associates to the letter of the National League of New York.

These distinguished statesmen and scholars, calm and truthful observers, in their letter exhibit by contrast the injustice which has been done the President by some of the zealous abolitionists of America. They say:

"We, gentlemen, are abolitionists; and we declare that we have never hoped nor wished for a more steady, rapid, and resolute progress. We have understood the difficulties which surrounded Mr. Lincoln. We have honored his scruples of conscience with regard to the Constitution of his country which stopped his path. We have admired the courageous good sense with which he moved straight on, the instant he could so do without danger to his cause or violation of the law."

At the same time they say, with a perfect conviction, that the destruction of slavery is the salvation of our country:

"We hold it to be of the first importance that the cause of the war shall not survive the war; that your real enemy, slavery, shall not remain upon the field."

The masses of the people everywhere trust and love him. They know his hands are clean and his breast is pure. The people know that the devil has no bribe big enough, no temptation of gold, or place, or power, which can seduce the honest heart of Abraham Lincoln. They know that while he is President there is no danger of a coup d'état. Let him exercise whatever extraordinary powers the public safety may require, the people instinctively feel that their liberties and laws are safe in his hands. They sleep soundly, with no disturbing apprehensions, while he holds the reins. Impetuous, eager, impatient men call him slow, over-cautious, wanting in energy. Remember the times in which we live; remember the danger of reckless energy, of unscrupulous will and passion.

You have a Chief Magistrate of clean hands and pure heart; sagacious, firm, upright, and true. Somewhat rude and rough, it may be, but under this rough exterior you have the real and true hero. If he is a diamond in the rough, he is nevertheless real, with no false glitter or garish pretension. You have in him a man of that sobriety, of that self-command, of that freedom from passion, of that justice and truth, of that soundness of judgment and perfect rectitude of intention, that has had, in all these attributes, no parallel since the days of Washington.

Taking the last five eventful years, and Mr. Lincoln has exerted a greater influence upon the popular heart and in forming public opinion than any other man. If slavery now reels and staggers in its last struggles, it is from the blows it has received at his hands. His speeches and writings, plain, homely, and unpolished as they sometimes are, have become the household words of the people, and crystallized into the overwhelming public sentiment which demands the extinction of slavery.

"He is a radical—a radical from conviction, not from passion, or hatred, or revenge. In all great radical changes, in running round sharp curves it is not better to put on the brakes sometimes, rather than to run off the track and smash up the train?

There are always men who are loud, boisterous, furious, intolerant, proscriptive, and cruel, whose hearts are filled with hatred and malice, and who, to eradicate one evil, are willing to tear up the good which it has taken ages to secure. Such was not the example set by the greatest reformer and most radical teacher who ever appeared on earth, the Son of God. Mr. Lincoln's whole theory as a reformer is to do the greatest possible amount of good with the least possible evil. Were he more violent, more carelessly destructive, did he use more violent words, he might be perhaps more the popular idol, but less the statesman and the Christian. This great statesman, this simple, unpretending man, I believe to be the instrument raised up by God to work out the regeneration of the nation by the death of American slavery.

Mr. YEAMAN obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. MORRILL, who moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

GENERAL GRANT'S REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask leave to offer a resolution, to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COX. Let it be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman can hear it read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the various official reports made by Major General Ulysses S. Grant during the war be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Ohio object to that?

Mr. COX. Not at all. But I do not want to have General Grant shelved away as a lieutenant general, as the gentleman from Illinois does.

The resolution was introduced and agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplemental to the laws relating to the War Department, and authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims against the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WAGON ROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill giving public lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of a wagon road for postal and military purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MISSOURI MILITIA.

Mr. BLOW, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of refunding to the State of Missouri the amount paid and expenses incurred by the provisional government of that State both for enrolled and other militia actually in service during the present rebellion, and report by bill or otherwise.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish Congress, if, in his opinion, it be compatible with the public interest, all the information of an official character which he may have received respecting the extension of the southwest branch of the Pacific railroad, and his order, if any, respecting the same.

PAYMENTS TO RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House whether any payments have been made to either of the following-named railroad companies, namely: the Illinois Central Railroad Company, the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company, or the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, for transporting property or troops of the United States since the 25th day of February, 1862, and if any such payments have been made, the amount paid to each company; and also the amount paid to each of said companies prior to the above date, and the basis on which said payments have been made; and that he also inform the House why payments have been made to said companies in disregard of their obligation to transport property and troops of the United States "free of toll or other charge whatsoever."

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, is that resolution susceptible of amendment?

The SPEAKER. If received by unanimous consent, it would be subject to amendment.

Mr. GRINNELL. If the gentleman from Indiana will modify it by striking out the clause asserting that payments have been made in disregard of law, I will not object to the introduction of the resolution. That is a reflection on the character of the railroad companies; and they claim that they have received no money in disregard of law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution only asks for information.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish the gentleman to strike out the clause to which I refer. With that stricken out I have no objection to the inquiry; but with it in I shall object to the introduction of the resolution. I take the ground that, in this matter, there has been no violation of law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will modify the resolution by striking out that part of it.

The resolution, as modified, was introduced and adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. ECKLEY, (at twenty minutes to four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the decree of the court of the United States for the southern district of New York, awarding the sum of $17,150 66 for the illegal capture of the British schooner Glen, and requesting that an appropriation of that amount may be made as an indemnification to the parties interested; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of Charles Fosdick Fletcher, who represents that he is a citizen of the United States, formerly residing in Kalorama, District of Columbia, now residing at Lancaster, Massachusetts, a writer for twenty years in favor of a railroad to the Pacific, and one of the commissioners appointed by Congress to organize that work, in favor of what he terms the commercial circle around the world. He represents that there is a necessity for that line of communication from the terminus of the Pacific railroad at San Francisco by a line of steam packets across the Pacific ocean to Shanghai, China, or some other point accessible, thence to intersect the overland route from Europe to India, which line would pass Gibraltar for England, and from Gibraltar, by way of Cadiz and Fayal, to Norfolk and Washington; so that, he says, a member of Congress adjourning for the summer could take his seat in the cars, travel west from Washington, and continue to travel west until he returned to Washington again by way of Norfolk, and be in time to attend the session in December following. He therefore prays that commissioners may be appointed, and that an act of charter may be passed by the Congress of the United States for the "Washington, Norfolk, and Cadiz Steamship Company." I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of citizens of Concord, New Hampshire, praying that the petition of the South American Steamship Company for an appropriation, either by way of subsidy or for the purpose of establishing postal communication between the United States and the countries lying to the south of them, especially those of Brazil, Venezuela, Peru, and Buenos Ayres, may be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of H. B. Whipple, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church of Minnesota, praying that clergymen and candidates for the ministry may be regarded as non-combatants, and, if drafted, employed as chaplains or in hospitals; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York and New Jersey, members of the Lutheran church, praying that such a modification of the enrollment act may be made as will exempt from military duty regularly ordained ministers of the Christian church; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of N. B. Walker, and others, paymasters' clerks, in the several pay districts throughout the United States, praying for an increase of their annual pay to $1,400; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILLEY. I also present the petition of B. R. Cowen and others, paymasters in the United States Army, praying that the pay of their clerks shall be increased to $1,400, setting forth the increase of expenses, the danger to which these clerks are exposed in the performance of their duties, and that they are required to be men of strict integrity and of the best business qualifications, and urging upon Congress an increase of their pay accordingly. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Thomas Wentworth Higginson, colonel of the first regiment South Carolina volunteers, praying that the full pay which, as he alleges, was originally promised that regiment may be allowed them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of David Heller and other non-commissioned officers and privates of the United States Army, praying that the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property," may be extended to such soldiers of the United States Army as may serve for the space of two years subsequent to the 15th of April, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FOOT presented the memorial of Lieutenant John Colhoun, the memorial of Lieutenant Egbert Thompson, and the memorial of Lieutenant George W. Doty, of the United States Navy, remonstrating against the action of the late naval advisory board, and praying for relief therefrom; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to present the petition of William Porter and William Lurkins, of the city of Milwaukee, who pray for relief from certain penalties incurred by reason of having enrolled and taken out a license for two steam tugs, after one of the owners had made a declaration of his intention to become a citizen, and before he had secured his final papers. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so referred.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Mrs. John J. Albert, praying for a pension on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 50) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on December 23, 1863, the following House joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (No. 12) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain John Rodgers, of the United States Navy, for eminent skill in the discharge of his duties; and

A joint resolution (No. 14) to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

OFFICERS IN AND NEAR WASHINGTON.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the Senate the number of each grade of officers belonging to the regular and volunteer service, in the Army of the United States, now stationed in and around Washington, and drawing commutation for quarters and fuel, or commutation for either quarters or fuel.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of all the correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebel authorities on the exchange of prisoners, and the different propositions connected with that subject.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. WILSON. Let it lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution being objected to, it lies over under the rule.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 39) for the relief of William Porter and William Lurkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to give notice that I shall to-morrow, or some subsequent day, ask leave to introduce a bill amending the act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas," as follows: first, by making Baldwin city a point on the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Bay road; second, by extending the provisions of the act to a railroad and telegraphic line from Lawrence, in the State of Kansas, to Pleasant Hill, in the State of Missouri.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 50) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1865, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SENATE LIBRARY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT], providing for the formation of a library of the Senate, is now before the Senate in order.

Mr. FOOT. I ask that that resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], providing for an addition to the rules of the Senate, is now in order before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD], at whose suggestion that resolution has been postponed from time to time, is not now in his seat, I think we had better pass it over; but I should like to give notice that the first day the Senator appears here I shall deem it my duty to call it up.

There being no objection, the resolution was passed over.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is a series of resolutions submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. CARLILE. I have some resolutions that I desire to submit and have considered when the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky shall be before the Senate; and if it is in order, I should be glad to submit them now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky are now before the Senate. Does the Senator from Virginia offer his resolutions by way of amendment?

Mr. CARLILE. I had not determined what disposition I would make of them. I desire them to be considered at the same time with the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask if the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky are before the Senate. I understood they were laid on the table; and if so, it would require a vote of the Senate to take them up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They were on the file of the morning business. If they were laid on the table by a vote, it would require a vote to take them up.

Mr. FOSTER. I should object to taking them up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut is right. They are not before the Senate.

NATURE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CARLILE. I desire to offer the resolutions I have in my hand, and ask that they may go on the table. I do not intend to call them up for consideration until the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky shall be before the Senate. With the leave of the Senate I will read them, and ask then that they go on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Government of the United States, in the language of Mr. Webster, is "the result of compact between the States," each State for itself adopting for its government the Constitution of the United States.

2. That the people of each State adopted for their government the Constitution of the United States in the same way as they adopted their State constitution.

3. That the Constitution of the United States was not binding nor had it force or effect in any State until it was ratified and adopted by the people thereof, as is evidenced by the fact that the people of North Carolina were not bound by it, nor was North Carolina a member of the Union created by it, for some time after the Government had been organized under it, and after it had been ratified by eleven other States.

4. That the Government created by the Constitution of the United States is neither "wholly national nor wholly federal." Were it wholly national the supreme and ultimate authority would reside in the majority of the people of the Union, and this authority would be competent at all times, like that of a majority of every national society, to alter or abolish its established government. Were it wholly federal, on the other hand, the concurrence of each State in the Union would be essential to every alteration that would be binding on all. The mode provided by the Constitution for its amendment "is not founded on either of these principles." "In requiring more than a majority, and particularly in computing the proportion by States, not by citizens, it departs from the national and advances toward the federal character. In rendering the concurrence of less than the whole number of States sufficient, it loses again the federal and partakes of the national character." The Government created by the Constitution of the United States, therefore, is neither a national nor a federal Government, but a composition of both. "In its foundation it is federal, not national. In the sources from which the ordinary powers of the Government are drawn, it is partly federal and partly national. In the operation of these powers it is national, not federal; in the extent of them, it is federal, not national."

5. That it is essential to the preservation of the Government, created by the Constitution, that the military should be subordinate to the civil power; and that such was the intention of the founders of the Government is evidenced by the fact that the President was made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

6. That Congress alone can declare what are crimes against the United States, and can alone legislate for the punishment thereof. That it is not competent for the President, in any character, or for any military commander, to restrict the right of suffrage in any State, or to impose conditions precedent to the exercise thereof, nor can the will or judgment of the President enlarge his powers beyond what are conferred by the Constitution.

7. That all the powers of the General Government are derived from the Constitution; that the Constitution of the United States confers power, and the constitutions of the several States limit power; that the General Government can only exercise such powers as are conferred by the Constitution of the United States; that but for the State constitutions each State within its own jurisdiction could exercise all governmental power.

8. That Governments are instituted for the protection of minorities, the chief objects being to secure to the citizen his right to personal liberty, and to protect him in the possession and enjoyment of his private property.

9. That there is no such power as the "war power" known to the Government of the United States outside of the powers conferred by and enumerated in the Constitution of the United States.

10. That the Government of the United States enforces obedience to its Constitution and laws as do the State Governments, by acting directly upon the citizen; that it cannot create a State government or a State constitution, or alter one; that it has no right to interfere directly or indirectly to alter, abolish, or procure a change in the constitution of any State, but is bound to protect existing constitutions in each and every State from any attempt to substitute for them a government not republican in form, and cannot act against States or political communities as such, but is confined in its action to the punishment of persons, there being no right of eminent domain in the Government of the United States, the soil of each State belonging to it and the people thereof.

11. That any attempt on the part of the Government of the United States, or any department thereof, to destroy the State governments and substitute for them territorial or any other form of government, would be an exercise of arbitrary and usurped power, destructive of the liberties of the people, violative of the Constitution, and an overthrow of the Government created by it.

12. That it is the duty of the servants of the people to whom the administration of the Government is intrusted, and to whom its powers have been confided, to put down rebellion against its authority whenever organized, to the end that law-abiding citizens may be protected in the enjoyment of the blessings the Government was designed to confer; that if necessary to this end the whole military and naval power of the Government can and should be used, not against the States as such, nor in a war against populations and homes, but against the citizens and persons so resisting the authority of the Government, and defying its power.

13. That the whole military power of the Government should be directed against the armies of the confederates, and that until they are broken and dispersed there can be no peace upon the basis of a reunion of the States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator moves the printing of the resolutions which he has submitted. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONFISCATION ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The following resolution, submitted by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], is now before the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to consider the propriety of repealing the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, relative to the construction of the confiscation act, and particularly so much of said joint resolution as purports to prohibit a forfeiture of real estate beyond the natural life of the offender.

The resolution was adopted.

RELIEF OF PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 10) for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the United States now held captive in the rebel prisons at Richmond and vicinity; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution at length.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps I can read the resolution with more facility than the Clerk, if the reading is called for. It is as follows:

Joint resolution for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the United States now held captive in the rebel prisons at Richmond and vicinity.

Whereas persons in authority under the traitorous organization which for the last three years has made relentless war upon the people of the United States and their Government, now hold in barbarous captivity many officers and soldiers of the United States, and refuse to exchange them except upon condition that they are allowed to retain such of our soldiers as they call negroes, and such of our officers as have commanded negro troops, and upon the further condition that we will also release upon parole all the excess of rebel prisoners now in the hands of our Government, amounting to many thousands; and

Whereas those same persons are unable or unwilling to make suitable or even tolerable provision for the support of their captives, thereby rendering their imprisonment as gross an outrage upon the dictates of humanity and the laws of war as it is upon the laws of the United States and upon their duty as the legitimate subjects of those laws; and

Whereas they have denied to the charity of the loyal people of the United States the privilege of supplying the most pressing necessities of their brethren in those prisons, and have recently refused even to receive a flag of truce from the authorities of the United States unless it is forwarded by an officer of their approval; and

Whereas it does not become twenty-two millions of people, having the rights of, and ability for, self-government, to allow rebellious subjects to dictate to them what agents or officers they shall employ, nor does it become them to feed plentifully at home while their brethren starve within a hundred miles of their own capital: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to call out and arm one million of volunteers to serve for the period of ninety days, unless sooner discharged, and to be employed to carry food and freedom to every captive held in rebel prisons, and to plant the flag of the United States upon every prison they occupy.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President be requested to assign Major General Ulysses S. Grant to the command of the forces raised under this call, together with such of the forces now in the field as may be joined with them; and he is hereby authorized to detail for the subordinate commands in the forces to be raised under the authority of these resolutions, such officers or privates now in the field as he may deem best qualified therefor; or he may assign to such commands any person or persons who may volunteer under the same authority: Provided, however, That any officer or private now in the military service of the United States who may be detailed to any such command by authority hereof, shall receive no additional pay for such substituted service, and no volunteer under the same authority, who shall be detailed to any such command, shall receive more than the pay of a private.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That persons volunteering under authority hereof shall be sworn into service on the — day of February next, and the term of their enlistment shall commence from and after that day.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That both Houses of Congress will, on the 4th day of March next, at twelve o'clock, meridian, adjourn to meet on the 4th day of June following, and immediately upon such adjournment each member thereof under fifty years of age, and who shall vote for these resolutions, shall report himself to the commandant of some company in the forces hereby provided for, and shall thereupon be sworn into the military service, and, unless sooner discharged, shall continue in such service without pay therefor until the expiration of the period for which such forces are enlisted.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. To what committee does the Senator wish the joint resolution to be referred?

Mr. HOWE. I really have not considered that subject. I should rather be inclined to have it referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, but I guess it had better go to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I should like to have it printed.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES TO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) to continue the bounties heretofore paid.

The motion was agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of moving that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance. I do it because, as I understand, it was not the intention of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to have it referred to his own committee, as they have already considered the subject and are prepared to act upon it. It will be observed, sir, that the resolution, if it passes, involves the expenditure of a very large amount of money; and in the present condition of the country, with the great calls that are made upon us for expenditures for the Army and for other purposes, I think it would be better, with reference to the public feeling in relation to money affairs, that, if the resolution is to pass, it should be understood that it has been investigated by those who are ordinarily intrusted with the consideration of subjects of finance, and that it has met with their approbation and the approbation of the Department which has the control of such questions.

I do not propose to delay it. I am as anxious as any man that it should be acted upon as speedily as it can be acted upon safely; and if it goes to the Committee on Finance, that committee will undoubtedly take the subject into immediate consideration, and will report just as soon as it can obtain the necessary information to satisfy its members in regard to it. I trust that this motion will meet with no objection from my friend at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, as it is made rather with a view to aid in the object, if it can be accomplished, than to say anything or do anything that might have a tendency either to defeat it or to throw any doubt upon its propriety.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it will be recollected that the other day both Houses of Congress decided that the bounties pledged by the Government should cease on the 5th day of January. The Government is exceedingly anxious to have the time extended. I think it will be satisfactory to extend it to the 1st day of the coming month, February. The only reason, I take it, for stopping the bounties was a financial one, and certainly that is one which requires the attention and the careful consideration of everybody concerned in the Government, and of every member of both Houses of Congress. I suppose, sir, it is necessary that we act upon this subject as soon as possible. I had hoped that we should act immediately, amend the resolution by striking out the 1st of March and inserting the 1st of February, and send it back to the House of Representatives to-day with that amendment, and have it at once disposed of. But I find the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has the care of financial matters in this body, and other Senators who are deeply concerned for the financial credit of the Government, are anxious that we should have some little investigation before we act. It is a question of very grave importance, and I do not like to take the responsibility of resisting a fair examination of a proposition involving so deeply the interests of the country, both in regard to raising men and in regard to money.

The Senator says that the Committee on Finance will take the subject into consideration and act speedily. If the committee will immediately address itself to the consideration of this subject, and report the resolution back to the Senate at the earliest possible day—and I hope it will be a very early day—I shall not take the responsibility of insisting that it shall not go to that committee.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the President's message, and the other bills relating to the same subject, be referred to the same committee, that they may have the whole matter under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 36, to amend the enrollment act.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and reported with amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section five, to strike out the following words:

Any person enrolled who shall remove from any ward of a city, town, or township, or from a county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, may, on application to the proper board of enrollment, be enrolled in the place of residence to which he shall have removed, and may, upon proof of such enrollment, have his name stricken from the rolls of his former place of residence; and.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirteen, to insert the words "who shall" after "or," in line twelve; and after the word "magistrate," in the same line, to insert "swear or affirm falsely;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof, acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees in any case pending before them, or either of them, and the same witness fees and costs shall be allowed as may be allowed in the district courts of the United States; and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations; and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal, or board of enrollment, or member thereof, acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, swear or affirm falsely, to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal, or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months, nor more than twelve months."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "three" in line fifteen of section eighteen, and insert "five;" and after the word "debt," in line sixteen, to insert "one half;" and after "United States," in line eighteen, to insert "and the other half for the use of the United States;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed any papers in support of a claim for exemption from draft, or for any services that may be rendered to the claimant, shall not in any case exceed five dollars; and physicians or surgeons furnishing certificates of disability to any claimant for exemption from draft shall not be entitled to any fees or compensation therefor. And any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act, and any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction in an action of debt, one half for the use of any informer who may sue for the same in the name of the United States, and the other half for the use of the United States, and shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to make an inquiry in regard to that section. It seems, sir, that it provides for the imposition of a fine not exceeding $500, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction in an action of debt; and it provides that the offender shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court. Was it the intention of the committee reporting this bill that in a civil action for debt the court may, after having given judgment for a debt, imprison the offender for a term not exceeding one year?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; that was the intention.

Mr. COWAN. I have only to say that if that be the understanding, it is novel, and it will be a very extraordinary commingling together of two jurisdictions, civil and criminal, and I think it had better be considered before it is passed by the Senate.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Senator will allow the amendments of the committee to be first disposed of. The next amendment of the committee is to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as authorizes the discharge of persons drafted into the service of the United States, under the authority of that act, upon the payment of a sum of money not exceeding $300, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest, as there may be differences of opinion in regard to that amendment which may lead to some discussion, that if any Senator desires to amend the bill further, we proceed with those amendments before we take up this section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. If no objection be made, that course will be pursued. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment will be laid aside for the present.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the second section by inserting after "United States," in the tenth line, the word "and," and by inserting at the end of that line the words "as already returned to the office of the Provost Marshal of the United States;" so as to make the section read:

And in ascertaining and filling said quota, there shall be taken into account the number of men who have heretofore entered the naval service of the United States, and whose names are borne upon the enrollment lists as already returned to the office of the Provost Marshal of the United States.

I suppose there will be no objection to this.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to it.

Mr. HALE. I am not entirely certain that that amendment of the Senator from Iowa will not meet the difficulty that presented itself to my mind. The difficulty is this: there are very few places in the United States that are open for enlistments into the naval service. A great many of the men that enter the naval service are merely transient residents at the place of enlistment; a great many of them are foreigners who have no particular residence anywhere; and if they are credited at all, they would be credited to the district in which they happened to enlist; and as there are—I do not know how many—but very few places of enlistment comparatively, all this population would be at once entered upon their lists and credited to the States in which they enlist. For instance, I suppose in Charlestown district, in Massachusetts, they enlist more than half the sailors that are enlisted in all New England—I presume more than four fifths of them; and under the operation of this bill they would generally be credited to that district. That would be exceedingly unjust. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will in some measure remedy that injustice, but I do not think it will do it entirely, and I do not know that it is possible to do it.

My own opinion would be, however, that the naval enlistments had better be kept entirely separate from the enlistments into the Army, for the reason that, in my humble judgment, it is utterly impossible to average and credit them in any way that will approximate to doing justice. The amendment which I had prepared to this very provision, and in lieu of the one that has been offered by the Senator from Iowa, was to insert after the words "whose names are borne on the enlistment roll" the words, "and who for the six months previous had been actually resident of said county, town, township, or ward of a city." In that way it would confine the credit to the city or place where they enlisted to the actual residents of that place, and would not allow them to put upon the enrollment list all the foreigners that might come up and propose to enlist.

As I said before, I think it would be better to leave these naval enlistments entirely out of the bill, but the committee seem to have thought otherwise. I shall vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, but I think it ought to go farther.

Mr. GRIMES. I have always been willing and anxious to do exact justice to every portion of the country that furnishes any of the persons who go into the naval service. The purpose that I had in offering this amendment was to obviate the very difficulty the Senator from New Hampshire has suggested. I was fearful that, under the bill as submitted by the committee, if enacted into a law, during the next two or three weeks there would be added to the enrollment lists the names of all those persons who have been enlisted into the naval service during the last twelve or eighteen months, and thus those States where there happened to be naval recruiting stations would receive a credit to which they would not be justly entitled. If there be any persons in those districts, bona fide citizens of those districts, who enlist, I am willing that they should be credited with those persons; and I think under the operation of my amendment they would receive exactly what they are entitled to, neither more nor less.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs intended to accomplish precisely what the Senator from Iowa wishes to accomplish by his amendment. Great complaints have been made in some sections of the country that they have furnished a large number of men to the Navy and have received no credit for them. There are townships in my State that have furnished more men for the Navy than for the Army, and have received no credit whatever for them; and when I say this I mean that they have furnished them of their own citizens, whose names are borne on their voting lists and the enrollment lists. I received a letter the other day from a town in my State, stating that they had furnished over six hundred men for the Navy, and over sixty of them within a very few days, at a cost to the citizens of the town of between three and four thousand dollars, and they received no credit whatever for them. We cannot go back and do exact justice; but as the enrollments were made during the past year, the committee thought it would be right and just and fair to all parts of the country that persons whose names were upon the enrollment lists, and who had enlisted in the Navy, should be credited to the places, not where they enlist, but where their names are upon the enrollment lists. If a citizen residing in a city or town of New Hampshire, whose name is enrolled there, and who is liable to be drafted there, has gone to any other place and enlisted, it will be for the people of his town to ascertain the fact, and he will be credited to the town. That is what I understand the bill means now. I want to accomplish that—nothing more, nothing less. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, I think, does not change that except in this respect: the Senator was fearful, as I understand it, that the enrollment lists would be changed, and the names of the persons thus enlisted added to the list for a special purpose; and he therefore confines it to the lists that have already been made up, and does not allow them to be amended. I do not think we disagree in regard to that; and I think the whole object is accomplished.

Mr. COWAN. I think this whole system of credits has been a mistake except so far as the credit is given to the State for the quota she has furnished. Let us look for one instant at the operation of it. In a county, town, or borough, there are, if you please, one half of the people who are loyal supporters of the Government in the conduct and prosecution of the war, and the other half are either lukewarm or offering such opposition as they may offer from the political condition of the parties in this country. The loyal and warm-hearted portion of the people volunteer, and you give to that borough credit for their patriotism. Who avail themselves of it? The lukewarm and those who really ought to be made to bear their fair share of the burden of the war. Instead of that, they get the credit of the exertions and sacrifices of their more patriotic neighbors, and are enabled in that way to enjoy a security which is not enjoyed by those who really and heartily support the Government. I think therefore that if this system of credits was confined to the quotas of the States, without undertaking to descend into the minutiae of counties, boroughs, and towns, it would be far better for the country. Besides, there is the impossibility of executing the law as it stands. How is it possible to do it? I should like to see a statement of the number of persons claimed to have been furnished by all these States, counties, boroughs, and towns, compared with the actual number of men in the field; for I have no doubt that the same man is claimed from different localities, perhaps two or three times over. People do not always volunteer or enlist in the place of their residence. They are claimed where they do enlist, and they are also claimed at their place of residence; and in this way no such thing as even-handed and exact justice can be done. It would be far better if the credit were confined to the States without descending into the minutiae of counties and townships. I merely throw out these suggestions for the consideration of other gentlemen who have paid much more attention to the subject than myself; but so far as I have been enabled to observe its working, the system of credits has had the effect I have stated.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania states the fact that there has been great inequality. That fact creates great discontent; and one of the great difficulties that have pressed on the War Office during the last few months has been this inequality. The Governors of the States and the representatives of different sections of States have visited that office for the purpose of having these inequalities adjusted. It is very difficult to do justice to all sections of the country, or to make equality; but I know that the Provost Marshal General, who has studied this subject carefully, is very anxious that this provision should be in the bill, and that the different wards of cities, and towns and counties should have the credit that justly belongs to them. I think the amendment proposed tends to equality. That it will not make absolute equality is certain; that cannot be done; but it will do so far as it is practicable to do so. I hope therefore the amendment will stand, for I think it will create a great deal of satisfaction in the country if the inequalities of the present system are adjusted as far as they possibly can be.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am opposed to allowing any credit to any State for the number of sailors it may furnish the Navy. That proposition was made at the last session of Congress, and I opposed it then. It was advocated, if I recollect aright, by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden.] I then opposed it, as I do now, upon this principle: from the beginning of the Government, almost, it has become a part of its traditional policy to give bounties to the fishermen of the New England States. I never have objected to that policy. In my service in the Senate, and in the House of Representatives, I always sustained that policy, and voted for a continuance of the bounties, and upon this reason, as expressed by its friends, invariably—that it was giving encouragement to the nursery of American seamen, and when the time of war or trouble came upon the country, these fishermen, who were encouraged by this bounty to hazard the dangers of the deep, would be always found a ready and a most effective body of seamen to enter the service of the United States, in defense of its flag upon the ocean. The ground upon which the policy was urged was a lofty and patriotic one. It commended itself to the minds and to the hearts of a majority of all the Congresses, I believe, that have ever sat in the United States since the organization of the present Constitution. These bounties amount to a considerable sum. They have been received for some seventy-five years. I do not pretend to be accurate, because I have not examined the subject; but they have been received by these fishermen of the northeastern States for scores of years on the express stipulation, by their friends and advocates in both Houses of Congress, that the purpose of these bounties was to foster this nursery of our gallant and hardy tars. Now, sir, when this school of seamen has thus been endowed by the Government, and has thus received its bounty and emolument from year to year, it seems to me that it comes ungraciously now from them to ask to be exonerated from the service which they were so often pledged to render to their country in consequence of these bounties. On that ground I shall vote against both the original section and the amendment. I shall vote against any proposition to deduct from the military quota of any State any of the sailors that may have been enlisted in that State, whether they are residents or non-residents.

Mr. NESMITH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to offer an amendment of some length; and as I presume this bill will not be finally acted on to-day, I should like to have it received informally and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment may be received by unanimous consent, and the order made to print it. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be printed. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move to amend the eighth section, in the second line, by inserting after the words "United States" the words, "or into the marine corps of the United States," so that it will read:

That all enlistments into the naval service of the United States, or into the marine corps of the United States, that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be credited on the enrollment to the ward, town, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move to add to that section the following proviso:

Provided, That such enlisted men are actual and bona fide citizens and residents of the ward, town, township, or county in which such enlistments shall be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. It seems to me there may be some difficulty in ascertaining the fact of bona fide residence. The sailor who goes into Charleston or New York, and is there for a day, is, in one sense, an inhabitant of the place, although he means to go somewhere else as soon as an opportunity is offered him. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to suggest that it would be advisable and right in itself to limit the credit to such seamen as may have been some two, three, four, or five months prior to the time of enlistment actual inhabitants of the place from which they enlisted. As he has very correctly stated, almost the whole of New England, except perhaps Massachusetts, will have no benefit of this credit under this provision, but it will go exclusively to the credit of Massachusetts. The same thing will be the case in New York, and the same thing in Baltimore. If we were to require a residence of one or two months prior to enlistment, that would answer the purpose; but there may be difficulties about it. Residence depends upon intent, and if you leave it to the provost marshal, or whoever may be the legitimate officer, to settle it, he may be either satisfied of the fact of existing inhabitancy, or he may require proof that the person claiming to be an inhabitant intends to be a permanent inhabitant, and questions of difficulty will arise I think in the execution of the law. If you require a proof of residence for a month or two months it will simplify it, and I think answer the purpose. I suggest that to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. I presume it is altogether probable that the language I have used is not the most fortunate that could be used to express my meaning. My purpose is this: take as an example, if there are six hundred men enlisted in the naval service from the town of Gloucester, whose names are recorded upon the check-roll of that town, I am willing that they should be credited to the town of Gloucester in this enrollment; but I am unwilling that Tom, Dick, and Harry, who are citizens of no portion of the United States, but are probably residents and citizens of some of the northern countries of Europe, who belong nowhere in fact, but who happen to come in transiently, and are enlisted in the city of Boston or the city of New York, shall be credited to those places. That is the purpose I have in view. If the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from

New Hampshire will adopt some more appropriate language in order to express that idea, I should be exceedingly grateful to him for doing it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Chair permit me to suggest that the amendment be read again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported again from the desk.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The object of that amendment would effectually nullify, if I may use the expression, enlistments into the Navy in my own State. Enlistments are procured there by paying bounties and paying high bounties. A town has to make out its quota, say one hundred men. The citizens are not willing perhaps to enlist either in the Army or Navy. In order to induce them to enlist; the various towns offer bounties, some $300, some $400, and some even as high as $500 for an enlistment. Now, provided they get a good soldier or a good sailor, their object is accomplished. The idea of the section is to relieve the town; that if they procure future enlistments into the Navy as well as into the Army through their exertions and by their money, they shall have the credit and the benefit of it in the estimation of the amount of men required of them.

Let me ask the Senator from Iowa what difference does it make whether these men are absolutely residents of the town and citizens of the State or not, provided you get them and they are the right kind of men? The effect of his amendment, so far as my own State is concerned, would be to leave matters just as they are now. There would be no particular effort to get men to enlist into the Navy. The Senator must recollect that this is not like the case of men voluntarily coming forward to enlist in the Navy on bounties paid by the General Government. If that was the case, his idea would be a correct one; but that not being so, the object being accomplished by the effort of the town or the ward, whatever it may be, and the money paid by them, it makes no difference to the Government whether the persons enlisted are citizens or otherwise of that town or ward, unless there is a difference between the class of men. I suppose, therefore, that the operation of the amendment would in fact defeat, in a very great degree, so far as my State is concerned, and probably so far as Massachusetts is concerned, the very object the Senator has in view.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have the Senator from Maine tell me how he is going to carry the law as it stands into execution without the amendment I propose? How is the Provost Marshal General going to credit the men who have been enlisted in the naval service in the city of Boston? How, under this eighth section, as it now stands without this amendment, is any town in the State of Maine going to get any credit for citizens of Maine enlisted in the Charlestown rendezvous?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not suppose any town in Maine will get credit for them if they are enlisted in the Charlestown rendezvous, and they would not get credit for them at any rate under any circumstances as the bill stands, that I know of; because if they are enlisted in the Charlestown rendezvous, does it state precisely where they come from? Is there any provision requiring a statement as to where they belong, what towns, what States, and where they are citizens?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; then they get no credit. My object is, and I suppose the object of the amendment is, when men are enlisted in a particular place, and by the efforts of that place, if you please to call it so, that that locality shall have the benefit. If that cannot be accomplished, the law is null.

Mr. GRIMES. The purpose I had in view was to accomplish exactly what the people of Maine desired when I was in Maine a short time ago. I found the United States ship Ino down at Wiscasset. It was down there for the purpose of raising enlisted men for the service. I propose by this amendment to allow each one of the towns bordering on the coast of Maine the privilege of having the men they raised and put on board that vessel, enlisted in their own harbor, credited to the town. Under the law as it now stands, they would not be credited to the town. I propose that they shall be credited to the town, provided they are citizens of the town.

Mr. COLLAMER. The bill, as I understand the reading of it, provides that they shall be credited in the town in which they enlist, provided they are residents of that town. The places of enlistment are very small in number. Does this amendment go any further and provide that they shall be credited to their place of residence, although that residence may not be the place of enlistment? Does it say anything about their place of residence?

Mr. GRIMES. I was going to try to explain what will be the effect and how it will affect the towns on the coast of Maine. Under the amendment, those towns where men have enlisted in consequence of bounties furnished by the towns to induce their citizens, who are fishermen or sailors, to enlist, will be credited with them; but under the bill as it now stands, Boston and New York will be credited with them. The city of New York will be credited with some twelve thousand men who are not really citizens of New York; for I suppose the Senator knows that very few of the sailors who go to the cities of New York and Boston are really citizens of either place, or of the State of New York or Massachusetts. There are not as many sailors actual citizens of New York as there are citizens of the State of Maine. They are temporary residents there. The vast majority of the sailors in New York are natives of the north of Europe and Ireland. What I wish to accomplish is to prevent an undue credit being given to these great commercial cities like New York and Boston, to the detriment of the very section of the country which the Senator desires to protect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt of the Senator's intention, and if he could carry his intention out, I should be glad to have him do it. I am only speaking of the fact. I should be glad to have the section as it is proposed to be amended read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the naval service of the United States, or into the marine corps of the United States, that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be credited to the ward, town, or township, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, in which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty under the act aforesaid, under such regulations as the Provost Marshal General of the United States may prescribe: Provided, That such enlisted men are actual and bona fide citizens and residents of the ward, town, township, or county in which such enlistments shall be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The object of that will be simply this, as I understand it, and if not I shall be very glad to be corrected: it would accomplish the purpose the Senator from Iowa has in view; that is, it would prevent the city of New York, or the city of Boston, in making out its quota, from availing itself of persons enlisted who were not residents and citizens of the place; but how would that benefit the State of Maine, for instance? If these men were citizens of Maine and ordinary residents there, and enlisted in New York, we should not get any credit at all for them, being enlisted in another place. Therefore it does not benefit us a particle; it only prevents the credit for them being given to New York. But suppose, for instance, that in the city of Portland, where I reside, we desired to enlist men for the naval service—

Mr. GRIMES. Ships can be sent there, on which they may enlist.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. We desire to enlist them, and we want the benefit of their enlistment; but we cannot enlist them without paying bounties, perhaps not to the same amount, but precisely as we pay bounties for soldiers. We have got to pay for them if we enlist them. If they come in of themselves, not being residents or citizens, and enlist in the naval service, very well; we have nothing to say about it. We have no claim unless they are part of our population and go so far to diminish our quota. But if we have got to raise these men for the naval service as we raise men for the military service, by paying them bounties, what difference does it make to the Government whether they are citizens or residents, or not, provided we furnish the sailors; and if we do furnish them by our funds, why should we not have the credit? The same thing would be true of Boston and New York. They have got to pay for them if they enroll them. So it is now; if they enroll men into the military service, they have got to pay the bounties precisely in the same way; whether to the same extent or not, I do not know. What harm is done by allowing them to have the benefit of them? If the Senator will devise any way in which a citizen of Maine, if enrolled in New York, will be credited to Maine, I shall be very much obliged to him; but what he proposes does not accomplish it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there appears to me to be a difficulty in both the particulars spoken of by the Senators from Maine and Iowa. The object that the Senator from Iowa wishes to attain, as far as Boston, or New York, or any other large seaport town is concerned, his amendment accomplishes; but it does not accomplish the object which the Senator from Maine has, and which seems certainly to be a proper one. I understand the Senator from Maine to say that the port of New York, for example, should have the benefit of all men who are enrolled in that city because they pay for the enrollment. I do not understand such to be the law. The enrollment is one thing, the enlistment is another thing. The act to which this bill is a supplement directs that everybody in the city of New York—I select the city for the purpose of making myself understood—who is liable to be enrolled shall be enrolled as liable to duty. The practical effect of that might be that the same men would be enrolled in New York who would be enrolled in Maine. If those seamen who are enrolled in New York are liable to duty in Maine, the enrolling officers of Maine should enroll them; and when you come to settle the dispute as between the State of New York or the city of New York and the particular locality in Maine where the enrollment had been made, there would be a conflict which is to have the benefit of them. Is the town to which they originally belonged to have the benefit of them without reference at all to the fact whether the party was properly enrolled or not? Or will you make the enrollment in New York conclusive evidence that whatever seamen are enlisted in the port of New York are to be credited to New York, and leave the State of Maine without the benefit of being credited for the same seamen who have been enrolled within her limits? I do not know how we can avoid it; but it would be very desirable to do so if the principle is right as proposed, (and it seems to be right,) that each locality is to have the benefit of the seamen who have been enlisted into the service of the United States, as each locality has the benefit of the soldiers who have been enlisted into the service of the United States. Some more definite and certain provision should be made than seems to me to be made by the provisions of this bill. I think it would be better, therefore, if there is no immediate necessity for action on it, that the particular section should be passed over, that we may see if we cannot so frame the clause as to answer the purpose which the majority of the Senate may have.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion upon the point?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HOWE. The first part of the section to which this amendment is proposed, provides for credit for "enlistments into the naval service of the United States that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service" under the enrollment act. It seems to suppose that every person enlisting is liable to military service, and liable to service from some particular locality. Now, if there is anything, either in this bill or in the act to which this is proposed as an amendment, which will enable us to determine in what particular locality individuals are liable to service, then the latter part of the clause will accomplish just the object which I understand the Senator from Iowa is driving at, and without any amendment, because it declares that such a person shall be credited to the town, ward, or county in which he is liable to service.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the practical operation of the system as it stands, if I am correctly informed, is to consider all those seamen who are enlisted in New York as liable to service there merely from the fact of their enlistment, nothing else. They do not inquire whether the seamen should properly have been enlisted in the State of Maine, or whether, being enlisted in New York, the State of Maine should be entitled to credit for them upon the quota which she is to raise under this act. There is nothing in this act which says who is liable to service. You are to go into the original act for the purpose of ascertaining who is liable to service, and if you go to that act I suppose it will be found that only those are to be enrolled who are inhabitants or residents of the locality where they are enrolled. For example, the city of New York has, perhaps, fifty or one hundred thousand persons temporarily residents of that city every day in the year. You would not consider them as liable to military service there. They belong to the different States or to the other portions of the State of New York where they reside. They have been enrolled in those places, or ought to have been enrolled where they respectively reside permanently. The Senator, therefore, certainly does not suppose—at least I imagine so, and I submit to him that if he does suppose so it is erroneous—that everybody who happens to be in New York at the moment the enrollment is made is to be enrolled as liable to service in the city of New York. That cannot be so. There must be a residence in order to create the liability to service. But then, practically, so far as naval men are concerned, every seaman that goes into the port of New York, who enlists there, is, if the bill passes in the form in which it is now before the Senate, to be credited to the city of New York, although he is not liable to service under the original act.

Mr. HOWE. But the section as it now stands declares that they shall be credited to the county, town, or ward "in which such enlisted men were." When? When they were enlisted? I take it so. "Were or may be enrolled."

Mr. JOHNSON. "Were enrolled," but they are not enrolled.

Mr. HOWE. "In which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty." It seemed to me (and that was the point which I wished to suggest to the Senate) that if we need anything it must be something in this act to define under what particular circumstances a man is liable to be enrolled in any particular place. Having had something to do with the draft that was made under the authority of the States a year ago last fall, it happened to me to know that these contested cases frequently arose. A person under peculiar circumstances would be enrolled in two localities, and he would perhaps claim that he was not liable to be enrolled in either. It seemed to me very clear. In that case, inasmuch as the Government did not want to have but one chance at him, I held very promptly that he had the right of election, provided he exercised that right before the draft was made. He might choose whether he would stand the draft in one locality or the other. It seems to me now that if the original law does not define what sort of residence or what sort of inhabitancy shall make a man liable to enrollment in a particular locality, this bill ought to be so amended as to do that, and then it accomplishes the very object the Senator from Iowa has in view.

Mr. GRIMES. I think my object would be accomplished if my amendment were adopted. I believe the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Maine agree with that; but it does not, they say, exactly accomplish their object. I know that we are legislating at this time to affect the people who are exceedingly anxious to get men as substitutes into their service, who have even captured colored men as they passed through their city in order to credit them on the draft to the State of New York and the city of New York. I know that there are more than ten thousand men enlisted every year into the naval service at the single port of New York, and that more than one half of them, according to the official returns, are not residents of the city of New York at all, but are foreigners, who never have taken out naturalization papers, natives and subjects of Ireland, Germany, England, Scotland, Sweden, Denmark. But under the operation of this bill as it now stands, unless it be amended, the bill giving to the authorities in the city of New York the power to amend their enrollment whenever and however they see fit by putting the names of any men that they may find entered upon the ships' papers, we shall have those ten thousand men credited to the city of New York upon her quota, and they will continue to be credited just as often as the enlistments in the naval service shall expire and the men from the ships shall be discharged at the Brooklyn navy-yard and again reenlisted. Now, I submit that that would not be just even to New England; it would not be just to any portion of the country, in my opinion; it certainly would not be just to that portion which I represent. But I concur with the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, that this section be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can withdraw his amendment and offer it at another time by leave of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have one or two slight amendments to offer. In section one of the bill, line four, I move to insert after the word "necessary" the words "during the present war," so as to confine the operation of the act to the present war. It will then read:

That the President of the United States shall be authorized, whenever he shall deem it necessary during the present war, to call for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the public exigencies may require, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to add to section four the following clause:

Any person not physically disqualified, now in the military service of the United States, may be furnished as a substitute, provided his term of enlistment shall expire within six months from the time of substitution.

There is some ambiguity in the section as it stands. Is a person now in the military service of the United States an "acceptable substitute?" I should like to have the opinion of the chairman of the Military Committee on that point.

Mr. WILSON. I think so; that is, within the limitations of the Department. As I understand, the War Office have authorized men who have less than one year to serve to reenlist; they may reenlist anybody's substitute who chooses to take them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As substitutes?

Mr. WILSON. In any way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand it so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the operation of the law as it stands, then, a veteran soldier who receives $402 bounty to-day, may, when this bill takes effect as a law a month hence, be employed as a substitute and receive $1,000 bounty from the person who thus employs him, and be transferred from one regiment to another.

Mr. WILSON. No; he has reenlisted. I think the Senator will find the position to be this: a person in the service of the United States is not liable to be drafted, and the Secretary of War has authorized persons in the service of the United States who have less than one year to serve, to reenlist, and has offered them a certain bounty for doing so. They may reenlist and take the bounty. Any man who is drafted may reenlist one of them if he chooses, as things are now. A man who is drafted may get a substitute, and he has a right to go to the Army and get a substitute there. It is right that it should be so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then suppose he is reenlisted to-day; he is not subject to draft under the operation of this law, and a month hence he may be employed as a substitute.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; because then he has three years to serve.

Mr. SHERMAN. But why? Nothing prevents it but the regulations of the Secretary of War, which may be changed or modified. It is not the subject of legal regulation. I desire to give to the veteran soldier the right to accept the bounties that may be offered for substitutes, provided the term of his service which is unexpired does not exceed six months. It is of the highest importance to secure the reenlistment of veteran soldiers. We all admit that.

Mr. WILSON. Why not extend it to those who have less than a year to serve, putting it on the footing on which the regulations put it?

Mr. SHERMAN. If that modification is insisted upon I shall not oppose it.

Mr. COWAN. The effect of it would be to add to the bounty a discharge for the time they have to serve.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; if a veteran reenlists he is substantially discharged from present service.

Mr. COWAN. That had better be expressed. Let it be stated distinctly that in addition to the bounty they shall be released from the time they have to serve.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator propose not only to give them a bounty as substitutes, but if they have eleven months to serve, that the eleven months shall be given up to enable them to become substitutes?

Mr. SHERMAN. They will be mustered into service for three years, instead of having only an unexpired term of eleven months.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But they are mustered in as substitutes, and although the Government has a claim on them for eleven months, if you please, still to serve, the Senator's proposed amendment would authorize the veteran to clear himself of that service, and receive his bounty as a substitute, and take the place of somebody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the effect of the present order of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand not.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reenlistment commences from the date of reenlistment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is true; but the order does not allow him to become a substitute for somebody else.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, it does.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Surely that cannot be.

Mr. WILSON. If Senators will allow me a moment, I will state how this matter stands. The Secretary of War has issued an order of which every soldier in our Army who has served more than two years has an opportunity to avail himself. That order allows reenlistments into the service of the United States for three years.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I wish to ask him a question right on that point. Can he enlist for himself and enlist at the same time for another man, so that two are no longer liable to be drafted?

Mr. WILSON. I will answer the Senator; he can. A citizen of any State who is liable to be drafted may, by the existing law, get a substitute anywhere in the broad earth, out of the Army, or in the Army if the Government will allow the man in the Army to reenlist. That is so to-day.

A man who is drafted may say, "There is a man from my town in the service of the United States who has got less than one year to serve; the Government offers him $400 to reenlist for three years, and gives up the residue of his time; I will get this man for a substitute; I will offer to him $300 in addition to what the Government offers him to reenlist for three years;" and he is reenlisted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He is not reenlisted for that man.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, that man is discharged because he has got a substitute. I say that is the law, and it will be practiced the moment you commence a draft, and it is right and just, and the best thing there is about the draft.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is high time that any such practice should be stopped. It deprives us of two men.

Mr. HOWE. If the law is as the Senator from Massachusetts insists, I certainly do not understand the fourth section of this bill. The fourth section declares that "any person enrolled under the provisions of the 'Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish at any time an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft." I do not understand that any man in the service now, whether he has a year or a month to serve, is liable to draft. If I am drafted I do not see how I can go and hire him to serve for me, and get him accepted as my substitute.

Mr. WILSON. I will explain that. It is a very plain question. Under the existing law, and in that respect it will be precisely the same if this amendatory bill shall be passed, when a man is drafted he can obtain a substitute anywhere. He can obtain a substitute who is liable to be drafted, and have him accepted and put into the service of the United States. This is a provision that stands by itself; it is one that is now made for the first time. It is, that any person who finds himself enrolled, liable to be drafted, may, if he does not select a person who is liable to be drafted, furnish a substitute, and the Government agrees to accept that substitute before the man is drafted. He furnishes a substitute in order to relieve himself from a possible draft, not from a real draft. That is the whole meaning of the section.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then he furnishes a substitute for the enrollment, not for the draft—a substitute to be put on the roll in his place. Is that it?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; Senators do not seem to comprehend what this section means, and I hope they will examine it, and pay attention to it. I will tell Senators why it is put in the bill. We have had a great many provost marshals who have written to the Department to this effect: "Persons who have been enrolled come to us and want us to take substitutes for them before they are drafted; they are going elsewhere to engage in business; they want to go abroad; or, for other reasons, they want to relieve themselves from a possible draft; they have got money; they are willing to hire men to go into the service of the United States for them, if you will accept them." The Government could not do so, as the law stood before. This section provides that whenever any man finds his name enrolled, he may go to the board and say, "I will furnish you with an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to be drafted by your draft law; if you will take this man I will furnish him, you relieving me." We propose that he may do that. He incurs that expenditure simply to relieve himself from a possible draft, not a real draft.

Mr. COLLAMER. When, not being drafted himself but being on the roll, he brings a man as his substitute, does that substitute become an enlisted man from that time?

Mr. WILSON. That person becomes an enlisted man for three years, and is mustered into the service of the United States. The other man is released, and goes about his business; and if he should never be drafted at all, he gives the Government of the United States a man whom they could not draft. That is the benefit; it is all for the Government.

Mr. COWAN. Then I should like to know if this is not the shape into which it resolves itself: if the person liable to be drafted produces a veteran in the Army as his substitute, the Government not only helps him to pay for that substitute by paying $402 in addition, to his $300, but the Government also discharges the veteran for the time he has yet to serve. That is the whole of it.

Mr. WILSON. That is not the whole of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is another question I wish to put. Under that arrangement may not gentlemen who may possibly be drafted in Massachusetts go down among our regiments here, that came from Wisconsin, and are in the Army, and engage all of them whose terms expire within a year, to be substitutes for men in Massachusetts?

Mr. WILSON. We can do it to-day under the present law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Do it under the law, though the men are in the Army! I desire to understand this business, Mr. President; I wish to know what the law is. I do not suppose it is possible that by any rule of a Department, or by any law that was ever passed by Congress, a man can enlist, and at the same time enlist for himself and enlist for another person also.

Mr. SHERMAN. The object I had in offering this amendment is accomplished. I wished to call the attention of the Senate, and particularly of the Military Committee, to the ambiguity of the law. As I construe this section, any soldier who has been enlisted even but one month, may be hired as a substitute. It is true that under the orders of the War Department it cannot be done; but under the bill it can. I take it that this bill, if passed, will supersede the order of the Secretary of War; and the bill expressly declares that any man may be an acceptable substitute who is not a subject of draft. A soldier now in the service, although he may have been there but one month, enlisted for three years, is not subject to draft, and a shrewd lawyer would at once make the point. The chairman of the committee admits his construction of the law to be that a soldier is not liable to draft.

Mr. COWAN. That is true; but I think the honorable Senator from Ohio is perhaps not correct in his other construction. "Who is not liable to draft" is not the only qualification upon the substitute. He must not only be "an acceptable substitute," but also one "who is not liable to draft." The officer would have a right to reject a substitute because he was already in the service; and I should think it would be one of the best of reasons.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "acceptable,"

I think, by fair construction, would be applied simply to freedom from physical disability.

Mr. COWAN. They may reject on account of immorality.

Mr. SHERMAN. At any rate, it is manifest that the section as it now stands gives rise to many different constructions. Gentlemen differ about it. I agree myself with the purpose sought to be accomplished by the chairman of the Military Committee. I think that the veteran soldier who has served two years or more ought to have the benefit of any high bounties that may be paid; and I think the law ought to be made clear and obvious, so as to give him an opportunity to compete for the large bounties. I think, however, it ought to be confined to the respective States where the drafted men reside. I do not think the State of Massachusetts ought to be allowed to go to the volunteers of the State of Wisconsin for substitutes, or vice versa. I think that where a veteran soldier is offered as a substitute, it should be a veteran soldier in the service from the State where the drafted man resides, and that his term of service unexpired should not be more than six months, because it is not a good arrangement for the Government of the United States to allow a soldier who has served two years, and has yet one year to serve—probably as long as the war will last—to receive these large bounties, and thus discharge an able-bodied man. I now withdraw my amendment, with a view to allow the chairman of the Military Committee to examine the matter carefully, and report such an amendment as he thinks will make the section perfect.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I am willing to take his amendment as he suggested it. I am willing that the section shall be so amended that a person who wishes to get a veteran soldier as a substitute shall get a man from his own State, and that the time of the man in the service who is thus offered as a substitute shall not have more than six months to run.

Mr. COLLAMER. Allow me to ask one question. What sort of hurt or injury is it to any State to have a man taken from that State and credited to the quota of another State, if he is a man who is not subject to be enrolled? You may as well get such a man in one place as another.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will tell the honorable Senator the reason. The State of Ohio, for instance, has great pride in her regiments. She would dislike very much to have her regiments depleted by enrolling officers from other States taking men out of her own regiments and transporting them to Massachusetts, or any other State, by the offer of large bounties. It would destroy the esprit de corps of the regiments.

Mr. COWAN. Another reason I wish to state just here. It would bring the poorer States in competition with the richer States in a struggle to buy their own men for substitutes, which ought to be avoided.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to avoid that, but Senators, I thought, did not seem to understand this section at all. If this bill be adopted as a whole, amending the existing law, there will be some persons capable of doing military duty who will not be liable to be enrolled or drafted. For instance, all young men under twenty years of age are not liable to be drafted. Soldiers who are in the service cannot be drafted, and they cannot be reenlisted unless by the order of the Government. The Government in order to induce the soldiers to reenlist, has issued an order providing that if they have less than one year to serve, they may reenlist in their present regiments, and the residue of their unexpired time is given to them. Thus they have in reality but five years to serve instead of six. It is of great importance to get these soldiers into the service, and I wish those who are physically fit would all reenlist. The Government offers them $400 to do it. The State of Massachusetts adds $325 to that, and many towns are adding two or three hundred dollars to that. The people of a town in my neighborhood which has about sixty men to raise, and has a great number of men in the field, have contributed $12,000 to offer in addition to the Government bounty of $400 and the State bounty of $325. All the soldiers from my State who have less than one year to serve, may reenlist and receive $725, and all that individuals or the towns will add to that sum. It is of great importance to get these men into the service. This provision was made for the benefit of the Government in this respect. It provides that any man in the country finding his name on the enrollment list, and wishing to relieve himself from a possible draft, may enlist an alien, may enlist a young man under twenty fit for service, may enlist one of those men whom the Government have given leave to reenlist, as an acceptable substitute for himself, and thus relieve him from a possible draft. But if he waits to be drafted and is drafted, he will have then this advantage: he may, unless we amend the act, furnish an acceptable substitute wherever he finds him, whether the substitute is a man liable to be drafted or not. If the Senator would like to amend this section so as to provide that if the substitute furnished shall be in the military service, he shall be from the State where the person wishing to obtain him as a substitute resides, where they both reside, I will agree to it. I do not want the citizens of my State to go to any other State to obtain substitutes of any kind, unless it be to the rebellious States, and if I had my way I would open the rebel States to anybody and everybody in the loyal States to enlist black men and white men to fill our armies, and deplete those States, by putting their men into the service of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think our language is undergoing a very rapid transition. We hear a great deal about "the Government," and what "the Government" has done, and what is to be done for the benefit of "the Government." I am a little confused, and at a loss to understand the force and import of these terms, as well as the terms "loyal" and "loyalty," as they are used in modern lingo. I understand by "the Government of the United States" the whole organization of the Government, its Constitution, its departments, the officers who fill them, every one of the officers who fill them; and I have no more restricted idea than that when the term "Government" is used by me, or when I hear it used.

Now, sir, according to my understanding of the Government, it has authorized the enlistment of men for three years, and here comes in the Secretary of War, and upon his own authority makes an arrangement by which twelve months of the term of three years is to be remitted upon condition that the soldier to whom he offers this remission will consent to a reenlistment for three years, or during the war, and that is spoken of as an act of the "Government!" Why, sir, according to this idea of Government, a "Government" across the ocean once lost its head by dispensing with the laws passed by Parliament, and another Government, a descendant of that Government, in the second degree, was driven from his throne, an exile, into a foreign land.

Sir, I ask by what authority the Secretary of War is called "the Government?" I ask by what authority he assumes to dispense with the laws of Congress? I ask by what authority he presumes to remit twelve months of the term of the veteran in the field? Whence does he derive this high power? Congress might do it; but when one of the chief clerks of the President assumes to do it, even though it be with his sanction, it is an unauthorized exercise of power. What is the injustice to the country of this arrangement which has been made during the interval of the sessions of Congress, as I understand, by the Secretary of War? The country, the true Government, the people of the United States, lose the benefit of twelve months, or any term under twelve months, of a veteran soldier who by his contract, and by the laws of the land, is bound to serve for that twelve months or a less term for the benefit of the United States; and all this arrangement, it is said, is made by "the Government," and when you ascertain who "the Government" is, why the Government is Edwin M. Stanton, in the War Office!

It is said that the Government has authorized this reenlistment from its armies of any man who has a less time of his term to serve than twelve months. What is the effect of it? The country loses the benefit of twelve months or a shorter term of service of a veteran, and he becomes a substitute for another man who is liable under the law to serve for the full term of three years. The amount of time that the veteran has served, and the amount that he has to serve, is a full term of three years; he has stipulated in his enlistment to serve for that term; the law requires him to serve for that term; he has received a bounty to serve for that term; it is his duty to serve out that term. I deny that the Secretary of War can remit to him any portion of it; and if it is remitted to him, two men, instead of being bound to render service, and actually rendering service for six years—three years each—divide the matter between them and serve but five; one year's service is given up that is the most valuable to the country to be rendered by a veteran soldier.

Sir, I am a friend to the soldier who is in the service of his country. I am for remunerating him liberally. I want his term of service to be short and decisive, and to be triumphant. I will go as liberally to reward the soldier as any member of the Senate; but I say this arrangement made by a dispensing power usurped at the other end of the avenue, and manifested in the War Office, dispenses with the law, and the contract of enlistment by the soldier, and deprives the United States of one year's service, at least, out of six between two men.

Mr. HOWE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly; two of them, if you please.

Mr. HOWE. Just one. What law is it that the Secretary of War has violated in allowing these soldiers to be discharged?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer. I thought I had stated my proposition. Were not these men enlisted for three years?

Mr. HOWE. I understand so, "unless sooner discharged."

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me, I will read the term of service from the law:

"That the service of the volunteers shall be for such time as the President may direct, not exceeding three years nor less than six months, and they shall be disbanded at the end of the war."

I take it, the Government has the right, whenever it chooses, to discharge these men.

Mr. DAVIS. "The Government?"

Mr. WILSON. The President.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, now, I suppose he has, under that law; but I say that the arrangement of the President is unjust to the country; it deprives the country of the benefit of one year's service of a veteran, or if it does not do that it deprives the country of six years of service divided between two men, and limits it to five years. My honorable friend, I reckon, will not deny that position.

Mr. CONNESS. We give away one year and get three. Is not that a good bargain?

Mr. DAVIS. But it dispenses with the drafting of a man who is bound to render three years of service. The thing is plain; there is no misunderstanding it. Here is A who enlisted for three years, and who has served two years. Here is B subject to be drafted for three years. He comes up and employs A as his substitute, and one year's service of A is remitted to him in consequence of the arrangement. That is it. This is the act of the President. This is the act of the President, it is now said. I admit now that I am corrected, that the law authorizes the President to do it.

I do not know when the President acts and when the Secretary of War acts. This remitting of service did not profess to be the act of the President; it professed to be the act of Edwin M. Stanton. They say that he is the President in fact in relation to many matters. When he acts upon consultation and with the approval of the President, he ought to say so, that the country may know whose act it is; whether it is the act of the President or of the Secretary of War. But, sir, I object to this change of language; I object to the President or any other department of the Government being called "the Government;" and if the pay is not sufficient, give them more; if the bounty is not sufficient, give them more; but I suppose that both are sufficient. Certainly that is enough which is received by the soldiers of Massachusetts from the various sources that pay bounties, according to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think he states the bounties to amount to about a thousand dollars. That brought to my recollection a fact connected with the history of the father of Frederick the Great of Prussia. He wanted to get a regiment of grenadiers, and he paid the largest bounties for the tallest men. He heard of an Irishman who was about seven feet high, and he sent to Ireland repeatedly to obtain him as a recruit into his regiment of grenadiers, and paid, I believe, about two thousand pounds for him before he could secure his services. I suppose that the bounties offered in Massachusetts will secure all the quota that that State is bound to furnish, and that now the roads and alleys will be crowded with her volunteers.

But, Mr. President, I rose for the purpose mostly of explaining a matter between the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] and myself. I was ready to make this explanation for the last three days before the recess, but the Senator from New Hampshire was not in his seat, and I have deferred it until this morning. He is now in his seat. It will take me but a minute or two, and I shall confine my explanation merely to reading, making no comment at all. During the last month I made a speech in the Senate upon the subject of the exchange of prisoners. After I got through, the Senator from New Hampshire rose and uttered this language:

"Mr. HALE. Mr. President, nothing on earth was further from my intention or my expectation when I came into the Senate Chamber to-day than to take part in this debate. I do not now intend to trespass long on the attention of the Senate; but a statement has been made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky that I never will hear anywhere without entering my indignant denial of it; and that is, that the party in power and its representatives on this floor do not desire peace, but desire a continuation of this war to influence the next presidential election. A more atrocious allegation against honorable men I think I never listened to from the beginning of time to the present moment."

I suppose the gentleman did not begin with time. I interrupted him, and we carried on somewhat of a colloquy for a time:

"Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable gentleman will permit me one moment, I heard him make a much more atrocious allegation than that within the last two years, when he avowed that the army of plunderers that were marching upon the Treasury under this administration of the Government exceeded the number of soldiers in the field."

"Mr. HALE. If the Senator ever heard me make such a statement as that, I will admit it; but I never made such a remark, or anything like it."

"Mr. DAVIS. I think the Globe will prove it."

"Mr. HALE. The Senator cannot show that I ever made any such remark, or anything like it; but I will tell him what I did say, and what I will repeat. I said I thought the liberties of the country were more in danger from the profligacy that was practiced upon the Treasury than they were from the rebels in the field."

"Now, to return to the subject: If the allegation of the honorable Senator be true, I would sooner take the hand of a man from a charnel-house, covered with pestilence, than that of one of the honorable gentlemen around me. If that allegation be true, every Senator upon this floor that supports this Administration is stamped with the foulest treason and perjury that human nature can be guilty of."

"Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me—"

"Mr. HALE. No, sir; I do not wish to be interrupted."

The gentleman's denial on that day was very defiant, sir; and his defiant denial, as I understood, was to the substance of the imputation which I then made against him. It might not have been true in letter, in strict form; and it was not, as I concede, because I was speaking from recollection; but I will now read from the book, or extracts that I have taken from the book.

Mr. President, the gentleman will recollect well the indictment that he preferred against the Secretary of the Navy two years ago, and the series of speeches which he made to sustain that indictment in the Senate Chamber. He had the subject of a contract between the Secretary of the Navy and a brother-in-law of that officer referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. He was led to it by a report upon the same subject in the House of Representatives. He made a report from the Naval Committee; and he prosecuted the matter perseveringly, with ability, and with the most indignant eloquence. The Senator assumed on that occasion that this contract was a profligate contract—a most profligate contract—that it was given to a man who had no experience in the purchase of ships, and who was wholly incompetent and unfit to discharge the duties for which he had been selected by his brother-in-law, the Secretary of the Navy, and that it was given to him in consequence of the near relationship between the person who was appointed this agent, and the Secretary of the Navy who conferred it upon him; and that imputation was repeated time and again in the course of a series of speeches which the Senator made upon the subject, at least a dozen times. He stated, too, that this allowance was at the enormous rate of over ninety thousand dollars for five months of service; that it was without law, without the sanction of law, a profligate contract, given to an incompetent man to render a service for which he was wholly unfitted by reason of his ignorance, and all this in consequence of the relationship between the Secretary of the Navy and that agent, for the purpose of enriching the agent. If the gentleman denies that these were the positions of his speeches, I will read the speeches at length, but I have got extracts here from them.

The gentleman reported a distinct and emphatic censure upon the Secretary of the Navy for that contract, and in a speech in support of the report he said:

"Sir, I do not know what other Senators may do. I cannot, I dare not; I should expect the finger of scorn from the hut of poverty to point me out as reckless and faithless for being here a member of the Senate in this hour of our country's peril, if I had failed to rebuke profligacy in the expenditure of public money, let it be when and where it may."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-Seventh Congress, second session, part one, p. 700.

And the profligacy that he then was rebuking in such indignant terms was the profligacy of the Secretary of the Navy extended to his brother-in-law, an ignorant and incompetent man, according to the Senator's denunciation, for the duties that he was selected to perform.

"I believe that this whole system of public robbery and profligacy in expenditure must be rebuked, and rebuked here. I believe that a different state of things must be resorted to, or we shall have no country to save. There is an old saying—I am not certain it does not come from inspired wisdom—that it is as well to die by the sword as by famine. And, sir, if this system is to go on, the army that we have in our midst will be more formidable and more to be dreaded than any that is on the other side of the Potomac."—Ibid., p. 701.

I admit that the gentleman's reference was to the army of the enemy on the other side of the Potomac, and not our own. But I agree with the sentiment, I believe it to be true, and believing it to be true I give it utterance. I greatly desire it is not true. I have the gentleman's authority for its truth—his authority after he had investigated the subject. He said also:

"I believe the Secretary of the Navy to be as honest a man as there is connected with the Government."—Ibid., p. 246.

Well, now, let us see what he says of his fellows. I believe, myself, he is the most honest man connected with the Administration; I believed it then, and I believe it now:

"I repeat, as I have once before in this matter, I have no desire to injure the Secretary; I have no desire to stab his reputation; I have no desire to detract anything from him that belongs to him; but I stand here one of the representatives of a State of this Union, of a people that are taxed and to be taxed to the last point of human endurance. Upon a recent visit which I made to my home, in the cold days which have just passed away, it is no fiction and no exaggeration when I tell you that old men have stood, with tears in their eyes, and have declared that they apprehend more of danger to the Government and the Union from these corruptions and these profligate expenditures, than from the enemy which is in arms against us on the other side of the river."—Ibid., p. 246.

Let me say to the honorable Senator that I then shared, and I now share all the apprehensions of his virtuous and indignant constituency. The very apprehension of danger that they had then, I had then, and I now have, and it is a most threatening danger to our Government and to the perpetuity of our institutions.

Again:

"I do not know but I may over-estimate, entirely over-estimate the character of this transaction; but I tell you, sir, I believe, and I declare it upon my responsibilities as a Senator of the United States, that the liberties of this country are in greater danger to-day from the corruptions and from the profligacy practiced in the various departments of the Government than it is from the open enemy in the field."—Ibid., p. 700.

That was the gentleman's emphatic declaration on that occasion. I concurred with it then; I do now; and I agree with him that the people must arouse to the boldness and the profligacy of these expenditures and these corruptions in the departments of the Government, which the gentleman then denounced with an eloquence that I cannot even approach.

He said further:

"I tell you if we are to have a victory we are to begin here; if we are to make a stand for the defense of our liberties we are to begin it here. If there is to be reform anywhere it must be inaugurated in this Congress, and on this floor; and this Senate must set their faces like a flint against every misappropriation of the public funds, and against every act of favoritism; against every in-tolerance of profligacy; against every waste of the public money."—Ibid., p. 700.

The gentleman having reference to that particular transaction.

"I know it is very difficult for gentlemen to bring themselves up to the standard of passing condemnation upon those with whom they have been politically and socially connected." "I know it is pleasant to bask in the sunshine of power. I know that it is pleasant to have influence with those who administer the Government and dispense its patronage, and appoint those who carry on the administration. I appreciate those things as much as anybody. I appreciate as highly as anybody the amenities and courtesies of social life. But, sir, when the interest of the country is at stake, and when the interests of the people demand that these things should be exposed, and the seal of condemnation fixed upon them, I will not hesitate, let the consequences be what they may."—Ibid., p. 700.

Again:

"It is time that the Senate acted. I have done my duty. I have no more interest in it than you have, Senators. If the Senate fail, if the Government fail, if Congress fail, then, sir, reverently would I appeal to a higher Power, and I would say, 'O, Christ! who with a whip of small cords drove the money-changers from the temple of Jerusalem, is there no scourge for the laceration of those who would turn the temple of our liberty into another den of thieves?'" [Applause in the galleries.]—Ibid., p. 701.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to make any extended comment upon the point between the Senator and myself, or on the speeches from which I have read. I could read many other passages that are as pointed and as denunciatory as those which I have read, in the various speeches which the gentleman made on that subject. I intended to content myself simply with reading with a view to the point that sprang up suddenly between the Senator and myself, and to give his speech of two years ago as authority and proof substantially of the position which I assumed, and which the Senator denounced in such strong terms.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as I said when I spoke last, nothing was further from my intention than to enter into that debate, and I will say now that I regret very much that the Senator from Kentucky has deemed it necessary to renew the subject. I confess that I do not see that he has made good the point which he attempted to establish; and I leave it with no disposition to do him injustice, and gratified that he has taken the subject into his own hands and done himself justice. I leave the subject, simply saying that I am proud myself and grateful to him that I have made a speech in the Senate which made such an impression upon him that he thought it necessary two years afterwards to come in here and repeat it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. The impression was so strong and durable that in its general substance it remained upon my mind before I referred to it, and I think that the honorable Senator is a little more forgetful and oblivious himself of his own avowed principles of political morals than I am.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no other amendment be offered to the bill, the question will recur on the last amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to offer a new section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a section still unacted upon, proposed as an amendment by the committee.

Mr. GRIMES. But by consent that was laid aside until the bill should be otherwise perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive other amendments.

Mr. GRIMES. The amendment which I propose is to insert the following section, to come in after section eight:

And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, master-at-arms, or other person having an appointment or acting appointment, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment, and forming one of a ship's complement.

Mr. WILSON. I think that section entirely unnecessary, as all persons in the naval and military service of the United States are expressly exempted by the terms of the ninth section of the bill. If Senators will refer to that section, they will find that it expressly exempts "all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of draft." I think that covers everything that need be provided for. The clause was put into the bill to cover the very thing suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was going to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts in relation to the effect of that provision in the ninth section. This draft may not occur until the term of service shall have expired of some who have been three years in the service of the United States. If the draft occurs while they are in service, they are exempt of course; but if the draft occurs after they go out of service, although they have served for three years in the Army of the United States, is it the intention of the law that they shall be again liable to draft? It does not seem to be expressed so as to make the point very clear, but the language of the section exempts only those in service at the time of the draft.

Mr. WILSON. By the existing law persons who were in the military service when it was passed are not liable to be drafted for two years from the 1st of July last. The bill now pending, amendatory of that law, provides that all persons, whether they were in the military service at that time or not, who have not been in service two years, shall be liable to draft, but it provides that soldiers who have been in the service two years, and have been honorably discharged, shall not be included in the draft. There were some regiments in the service for two years—thirty-eight, I think, from New York, and a few from Indiana, perhaps fifty regiments in all. They have been honorably discharged and mustered out of the service, having served two years. It was thought rather hard to put them in the draft, and we have provided for exempting them. So, too, when the time of the men who have served the country three years is out, they ought not to be drafted, at least not for the present. Perhaps if the war goes on some years we shall have to put their names on the list; but in the present condition of the country, I think the man who has served two years and been honorably discharged has rendered good service to the Republic, and we ought not to force him into the service again. We propose that the names of the six months' men and the nine months' men, the militia called out for brief periods, shall go upon the enrollment lists.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask if persons who have served two years are excepted by this act which we propose to pass, from enrollment? If so, I should like to know in which section of the act the exemption is.

Mr. WILSON. They are exempted by the existing law, and we provide by this act that persons who have not served two years shall be liable.

Mr. JOHNSON. Which part of the act?

Mr. WILSON. I will find it for the Senator presently.

Mr. GRIMES. Section nine, as it now stands in the bill submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, may be liable to misconstruction, and it does not include all the cases that it would be desirable should be included in the exemption. For instance, who is to decide that a man is in the military or naval service of the United States? The Provost Marshal General? What is he going to decide by? By the law of the United States which defines the particular officers that shall compose an ordinary ship's complement? If he decides by that, then he would exclude pilots, for they are not known as being in the naval service of the United States, and yet if you take away the pilots in service on our western waters you destroy the efficiency of the whole naval service there, and render useless eighty vessels now in our service.

There can be no possible objection to the amendment as I have submitted it, and I can say to the Senate that it meets the approval of the Provost Marshal General, for I showed him the amendment as I had drawn it, and he wrote in pencil marks upon it, "and being actually in the naval service," and I have put that phrase in. There can be no objection to it as it here stands. As the bill now is, it leaves the question entirely in the control of the military department, without there being any means for the naval department to assert its rights. I think we ought to treat both services as entitled to equal rights.

Mr. WILSON. Let me hear the amendment again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, master-at-arms, or other person having an appointment or acting appointment, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment, and forming one of a ship's complement.

Mr. WILSON. There is one objection to that. I have no objection, certainly, to exempting pilots; I supposed they were in the naval service of the United States, at least for the time being; but this amendment includes in the exemption civil officers. It includes clerks on board vessels, the clerks of paymasters. We do not exempt clerks in the War Office, or in the paymasters' offices anywhere, and I think those civilians who are on board vessels should not be exempt.

Mr. GRIMES. We have not twenty vessels in the naval service now in commission the paymasters on board of which are entitled to clerks. These acting assistant paymasters are entitled to an enlisted man, who is assigned to them, who assists them in the performance of their duties, and you cannot take him anyhow.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think that my friend from Massachusetts is mistaken as to the effect of the ninth section, for the language of this section is sufficiently forcible to repeal all inconsistent provisions of any other statute; for this section provides in express words in the last two lines, "no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt;" that is, excepted in this section; and this section enumerates those who are to be exempt:

"Such as are rejected as physically and mentally unfit for the service, the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, the Governors of the several States, and all persons actually in the military or naval service at the time of draft."

Now, if they happen to be discharged, if their time has expired before the draft, they are liable to be drafted, because this very section says that no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt. I think that must be the necessary construction put upon this section, and as my friend is of a different opinion, and it seems to me he is mistaken, I call his attention to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was under that apprehension that I inquired of the Senator from Massachusetts if this bill made an exception of those who had served two years. I do not find it in the bill, and if it is not in this bill, the Senator from Wisconsin is clearly right that no persons are exempt except such as may be excepted by virtue of the ninth section of this act.

Mr. WILSON. By the existing law, persons in the military service of the United States at the time it was passed were not liable to be enrolled.

Mr. CLARK. But this will repeal the existing law.

Mr. WILSON. No, it does not repeal the existing law; certainly it was not so intended. We provide in the fifth section of this bill for the enrollment of the nine months' men and others who have served less than two years. The provision is that "any person arriving at the age of twenty years, and also any person who has not been in the military or naval service of the United States two years and honorably discharged therefrom," shall be enrolled. It was intended to enroll men who had served less than two years, but not to enroll those who had served for that period of time. If Senators think this exemption section will override that provision, I am willing to have it amended, but that was the object.

Mr. CLARK. You had better consider it carefully.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa by striking out the words "or other person."

The question being put, it was announced that the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I rose while the vote was being taken, to ascertain what amendment was proposed to be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A new section is offered as an amendment, and the Secretary will read it as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, or master-at-arms having an appointment or acting appointment, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment, and forming one of a ship's complement.

Mr. HOWE. I did not understand whether the question put to the Senate was on that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question put was on an amendment to the amendment, striking out the words "or other person" after the word "arms."

Mr. GRIMES. Has that amendment to the amendment been declared to be carried?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so decided; but if there was a misunderstanding of the matter, with the consent of the Senate the Chair will regard it as open, and put the question again.

Mr. GRIMES. The law of Congress determines what shall be the complement of a ship's crew, and I suppose nobody claims that we have assigned to any ship more men for any specific duty than the public necessities of the service require. Now, with the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts carried, it will be in the power of the officers who are to enforce this draft, at any moment, if there happens to be one of the men on board a ship drawn, to send for him to the ship at a time when the necessities of the country may require that she should go to sea, and take him from her and break up the ship's crew. As the amendment which I have submitted is drawn, there can be no hardship to anybody. It only exempts men who compose part of a ship's complement as defined by the laws of the United States, and only exempts them during the time that they are actually in the service as a part of that ship's complement; and the moment they cease to be a part of it, that moment they can be enrolled under one of the sections of the Senator's bill and be subject to draft. It seems to me there is nothing more palpable than that it ought to be adopted just as I have proposed it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With the leave of the Senator from Massachusetts, in order to relieve the ninth section of any ambiguity on that subject, I propose to insert, after the word "draft," in the fifteenth line, these words:

And who shall have been in the military or naval service of the United States during the existing war for two years or more, and been honorably discharged therefrom.

Mr. SHERMAN. That creates the same difficulty. The fifth section and the ninth section taken together cover the whole ground.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose also to amend the fifth section by inserting, after "two years," in the thirteenth line, the words "during the existing war." They may have served in the Mexican war or some old Indian war.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would make the bill incongruous. We should then add to the ninth section, also persons under twenty years of age, and all other exceptions. I think, as it now stands, it is perfectly clear that no person is to be enrolled under the age of twenty years, or who has been in the military service two years, and then the ninth section exempts certain classes of persons. The sections will be construed together as a matter of course, and will cover all the cases of exemption.

Mr. HOWARD. I hardly think that amendment is necessary. It strikes me that it is already sufficiently clear and definite, especially when we recur to the fifth section. That section declares "That boards of enrollment shall have power to enroll any person whose name shall have been omitted by the proper enrolling officer, and any person arriving at the age of twenty years, and also any person who has not been in the military or naval service of the United States two years and honorably discharged therefrom."

If he has been in the naval or military service of the United States he cannot be enrolled; or if he is, his name will be improperly inserted on the enrollment. The ninth section includes among the persons to be exempted—

"All persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of draft; and no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt."

That is, no persons except such as are excepted by this act shall be exempt. That exception, I take it, covers that exact class of persons, those who have been in the service for two years or more. It strikes me, therefore, that the bill is already sufficiently definite and clear on that point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The ninth section of this bill is an amendment to the second section of the act of last year, and the second section of that act is the one that purports to give in language and name the persons who are exempt, and winds up by the same language that is used at the close of this section: "and no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt;" which certainly are those excepted by this section of the statute.

Mr. HOWARD. What meaning does the Senator give to the word "herein?" It strikes me that it includes this present act which we are passing.

Mr. JOHNSON. With the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin I wish to say a word. It was because this section, as I supposed, would repeal any antecedent exception that may have been in a prior law that I made the inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether the soldiers who had been two years in the service and honorably discharged were excepted by this act. I had not been able to see it in the bill until it was pointed out by the chairman; but he having pointed it out, I submit to the Senator from Wisconsin that it is necessary to adopt such an amendment as he proposes. The words in the fifth section alluded to by the Senator from Michigan provide that no person shall be liable to service, &c., who has been in the military service of the United States two years and honorably discharged therefrom. The ninth section, which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin supposes contains only a provision applicable to the original act of March 3, 1863, and not to this act, contains these exceptions: it proposes to strike out of section two of the original act all after the word "enacted," and to insert the following:

"That the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from the provisions of this act."

That is, of this act after it shall become a law, not of the act of March 3, 1863, but of this law, provided we pass it with this amendment. Then it goes on afterwards to say:

"Such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service, the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, the Governors of the several States, and all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of the draft; and no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt."

What is the meaning of the term "herein" as there used? It means "in this act." The particular exceptions to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers are in addition to the exceptions that are to be found in the original act, or to be found in this act after the terms of the original act become a part of this act. In other words, the law will then mean that the Vice President of the United States, the judges, &c., are to be excepted from this act; and also all persons who are not liable to military duty under this act; and those who are not liable to military duty under this act are those who have served for two years and have been honorably discharged. The meaning, therefore, of the section, as I think, is precisely the same as it would be if the terms in the fifth section excluding the two years' men were incorporated word for word in the ninth section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The amendment which I suggested—in section five, line thirteen, after the word "years," to insert the words "during the existing war"—seems to be necessary to make it plain, and I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted at the close of the ninth section, as a proviso:

Provided, That all persons recognized as clergymen or ministers of religion by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion to which they belong, when called into the military service under this act shall be regarded as non-combatants, and be employed as chaplains or in hospitals.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend that amendment by striking out after the word "that" the words "all persons recognized as clergymen or ministers by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion to which they belong," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "ordained ministers of the gospel;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That all ordained ministers of the gospel, when called into the military service under this act, shall be regarded as non-combatants, and be employed as chaplains or in hospitals.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. As this bill proposes to repeal altogether the $300 exemption clause, so far as I am concerned I desire to record my vote in favor of that amendment, believing that ministers of the gospel should not be forced into the field. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays upon that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment to the amendment. Does the Senator desire the yeas and nays upon that?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire them on the question of exempting preachers of the gospel from field duty.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My object in offering the amendment to the amendment is simply this: there are in a number of denominations throughout the country, many persons recognized as ministers or preachers who are not regularly ministers or preachers of the gospel, and whose business it is not to devote themselves exclusively to the preaching of the gospel. I am willing to make this exemption sufficiently broad to include all denominations, Jew or Gentile, but there are a very large class of persons who officiate as preachers of the gospel and are called ministers of some denomination, who really are not such, and who do not devote their time exclusively to the preaching of the gospel, but devote their time to the prosecution of other pursuits.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut whether it may not be best to withdraw his amendment for the present until we have acted on the exemption clause. That may govern the vote on this proposition.

Mr. DIXON. I am perfectly willing to adopt that suggestion. Let it lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Do I understand the Senator from Connecticut to intend to offer it again?

Mr. DIXON. Of course. I look to offering it again.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If you do not, I propose to offer it myself.

Mr. DIXON. I do not propose to offer it until the question of commutation is settled.

Mr. COLLAMER. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the fourth section of this bill. I must acknowledge that I did not, at the first reading, understand the purport of that section; but he has explained to me that it is intended to give a person who is enrolled merely, the privilege of obtaining a man as a substitute who is not enrolled, and who is not subject to be enrolled. Now, the word "substitute" is to be received, I suppose, in its ordinary acceptance. It means, in the place of, to stand in lieu of. If a man who is under the enrollment obtains a substitute, it is a substitute for the enrollment, and for the draft when the draft comes. That is the legal effect of it; that is the grammatical effect of it. Hence, in order to carry into effect the purpose which the gentleman desires, I wish to insert in the sixth line, after the word "draft," the words, "and who enlists for three years, and is mustered into the service." It will then read:

"That any person enrolled under the provisions of the 'Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish, at any time, an acceptable substitute who is not liable to draft, and who enlists for three years, and is mustered into the service, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt," &c.

That is, if the substitute he furnishes shall enlist and be mustered in, and then it shall have the effect to discharge him from liability; but as it stands now, he is discharged if he furnishes an acceptable substitute. It does not require that the substitute shall enlist.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly have no objection to the amendment, if it makes the section more clear or certain. I have no doubt of its meaning now that an acceptable substitute is a person who enters the service and is accepted by the Government of the United States as a soldier; but if the Senator thinks it necessary to make the amendment, I certainly have no objection to making any portion of the bill as clear as possible.

Mr. COLLAMER. Because the word "substitute" has been so much used of late in reference to men going into the Army, it is supposed that the word "substitute" means soldier. It does not mean any such thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that this proposition lie over until we act on the section in relation to the $300 exemption clause. I think we ought to act on that first, and then dispose of these other questions. I have already submitted an amendment to this fourth section, which I had laid over until that was acted on.

Mr. COLLAMER. I was not aware that there was an amendment to this section laid over. If there is, I wish this to lie over also.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better dispose of the section in relation to the $300 clause, which is the real difficulty in regard to this bill, and then act on these minor questions afterwards.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I understand it is necessary to have an executive session to-day, and I hope we can finish this bill to-morrow; and for that purpose I move to go into executive session with the view of taking this bill up and acting upon it to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. Before that motion is made, I wish to ask whether the bill with the amendments might not be printed this evening, so that we could have them to-morrow? There are a great many amendments that are not on the printed bill. I do not wish to make a motion to delay action upon it; but if the bill and the amendments can be printed by to-morrow, I will make that motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I intend to propose two amendments to this bill, and I desire that they be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the bill, with the amendments which have been agreed to, together with the proposed amendments, be printed.

Mr. FOSTER. I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose to move, as a substitute for the section reported by the committee numbered section twenty, the amendment which I laid on the table a few days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has it been printed?

Mr. SUMNER. It has already been printed, and I now call attention to it, because I should like to have the Senate prepared to enter on its consideration whenever section twenty reported by the committee comes up.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a short amendment which I should like to offer and have printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that my amendment be printed in connection with the amendments to this bill, so that it may be before the Senate to-morrow, as it is intended to be moved as a substitute for section twenty reported by the committee.

Mr. HOWE. I wish also to give notice that I shall propose the amendment which I formerly offered to Senate bill No. 18, to section twenty of this bill. It is in print, and need not be printed again.

Mr. ANTHONY. I give notice that I shall also propose as an amendment to this bill the one I proposed before to Senate bill No. 18. That has been printed, and it is unnecessary to order its reprinting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If Senators desire amendments to be printed, they can forward them to the Secretary at this time, and have them printed with the bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NEW MEXICO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the papers in the contested-election case of J. M. Gallegos vs. F. Perea, as Delegate from New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

NEW ROAD TO NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also announced that he had appointed the following as the select committee on a new road from New York to Washington, ordered by the House on yesterday: AUGUSTUS BRANDEGEE, of Connecticut; JOHN B. ALLEY, of Massachusetts; SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania; JOHN F. FARNSWORTH, of Illinois; JAMES BROOKS, of New York; JOHN A. GARFIELD, of Ohio; EDWIN H. WEBSTER, of Maryland; DAN-IEL W. VOORHEES, of Indiana; and ITHAMAR C. SLOAN, of Wisconsin.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN WEST TENNESSEE.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONFISCATION.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a joint resolution to amend "A joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BOUNTY.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill to provide for auditing and allowing claims for bounty under an act entitled, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws, and protecting public property,'" approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

KEOKUK SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

Mr. WILSON also introduced a bill making an appropriation for the erection of a monument to the United States soldiers buried in the cemetery at Keokuk, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SOLDIERS' AID SOCIETIES.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill to exempt from payment of postage letters and documents of soldiers' aid societies; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

WAR DEBTS.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to ascertain the amount of debt incurred in the several States in their efforts to aid in suppressing the rebellion; and that in the judgment of this House all debts legitimately and necessarily contracted for this purpose should ultimately be assumed and liquidated by the General Government.

Mr. MORRILL. I object.

The SPEAKER. That being a resolution calling on the executive department for information, must, under the rules, lie over one day.

PEACE.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the organized treason having its headquarters at Richmond exists in defiant violation of the national Constitution, and has no claim to be treated otherwise than as an outlaw; and whereas this Richmond combination of conspirators and traitors can have no rightful authority over the people of any portion of the national Union, and no warrant for assuming control of the political destiny of the people of any State or section of this Union, and no apology but that of conspiracy and treason for any assumption of authority whatever: Therefore,

Resolved, That any proposition to negotiate with the rebel leaders at Richmond (sometimes called "the authorities at Richmond") for a restoration of loyalty and order in those portions of the Republic which have been disorganized by the rebellion, is, in effect, a proposition to recognize the ringleaders of the rebellion as entitled to represent and bind the loyal citizens of the United States whom they oppress, and to give countenance and support to the pretensions of conspiracy and treason; and therefore every such proposition should be rejected without hesitation or delay.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, and HOLMAN, were appointed. The previous question was seconded, the tellers having reported—ayes 62, noes 30.

The main question was then ordered to be put. Mr. HARRINGTON. I ask for the separation of the resolution from the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is only operative on the resolution.

Mr. COX moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. LAZEAR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Baile, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orin, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, Stevens, Sweet, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, Cox, Dennison, Edgerton, Finck, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Knapp, Long, Marcy, William H. Miller, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Srouse, and Fernando Wood—24.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, was detained from the House by illness, and that he was paired on this and all like questions with his colleague, Mr. MOORHEAD.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that his colleague, Mr. MILLER, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. GARFIELD made the same statement respecting his colleague, Mr. SCHENCK.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question on the preamble.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARRINGTON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays none; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Baile, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Cresswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dennison, Dixon, Eliot, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harrington, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Lazear, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orin, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Srouse, Sweet, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—102.

NAYS—None.

So the preamble was adopted.

NAVAL DEPOTS AND YARDS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the attention of Congress has at previous, and also at the present session, been called by the Secretary of the Navy to the necessity for the establishment of new yards or naval depots for the construction and repairing of iron-clads: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing such yards or depots, and report at what site or sites such yards ought to be established; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROGERS introduced the following resolutions; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That as our country and the existence of the old Union are imperiled by a rebellion against the wisest and best Government ever devised by man, we are for the most united, determined, and vigorous prosecution of the war for the purpose of enforcing the Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, in all parts of the United States; but at the same time we are for adding to force the power of conciliation and compromise so far as is consistent with an honorable and lasting peace, and founded solely upon a restoration of the Union under the Constitution, and in no event to agree to or countenance a dissolution of the Union; and that we believe the appointment of commissioners upon the part of the Federal Government, to meet commissioners similarly appointed by the insurgent States, to convene in some suitable place, for the purpose of considering whether any, and if any, what plan may be adopted consistent with the honor and dignity of the nation, and based upon a restoration of the whole Union, by which the present war may be brought to a close, and the lives, limbs, and health of the gallant officers and soldiers of the Union preserved, and the liberties of the people maintained, is not inconsistent with the honor and dignity of the Federal Government, but, as an indication of the spirit which animates the adhering States, would, in any event, tend to strengthen us in the opinion of other nations and the loyal people of the insurgent States; and hoping, as we sincerely do, that the people of the southern States would reciprocate the peaceful indications thus evinced, and believing, as we do, that, under the blessings of God, great benefits would arise from such conference, we most earnestly recommend such conference to the consideration of the President and Senate of the United States, and request their cooperation therein, and hope that the President will appoint commissioners for that purpose.

Resolved, That the people of the several States now in rebellion against the Government of the United States, whenever they shall desire to return to the Union and obey the Constitution of the United States, and laws made in pursuance thereof, have a right under and by virtue of the said Constitution to reorganize their respective State governments with all their domestic institutions as they were before the war, and to elect Representatives to the Congress of the United States, and be represented in the Union with all the rights of the people of the several States, and without any conditions precedent except that of being liable to be punished according to the Constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, as their laws and acts of secession are unconstitutional and void.

Mr. ORTH. I move to lay the resolutions upon the table.

Mr. COX. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Would it be in order to move to refer the resolutions to a Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It would not, the previous question being demanded by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] to withdraw his motion, and let us take a direct vote upon the resolutions.

Mr. ORTH. I will withdraw it.

Mr. COX. I renew it, but with a purpose to vote against the resolutions.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. If gentlemen on the other side will give us a direct vote upon this proposition, I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table. There is a good deal of this clap-trap resolution business, and we might as well have done with it.

Many Voices. "Agreed!" "Agreed!"

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolutions.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. At what point?

Mr. HOLMAN. There are several resolutions, are there not?

The SPEAKER. There are two.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have the resolutions divided at the paragraph terminating with the words, "and in no event to agree to or countenance a dissolution of the Union."

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eeckley, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perlman, Pomroy, Price, William H. Randall, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu R. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—78.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Finck, Grider, Griswold, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Kernan, Knapp, Lazear, Long, Marcy, William H. Miller, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Collins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Srouse, Sweat, Joseph W. White, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—42.

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was received, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. SCOFIELD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to inform the House whether, under existing legislation, the seven-thirty United States Treasury notes due August 19 and October 1, 1864, will be paid in the coin of the United States. Also, whether any additional legislation is necessary to make the interest and principal of the twenty years bonds into which the seven-thirty Treasury notes are convertible, payable in coin.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That seems to be a question of law. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. As the resolution calls for information, it must lie over one day, under the rules, if objected to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection. This is not exactly a question of law, but simply an inquiry how, under existing laws, the Secretary considers it his duty to pay the bonds. It is a question we are all interested in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is a matter of construction, then, and had better be referred to the Attorney General.

Mr. STEVENS. The resolution, I presume, goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope my colleague will allow the resolution to pass to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it had better go over.

The SPEAKER. The resolution lies over for one day.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, offered the following preamble and resolution; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas a large number of our brave and patriotic soldiers and officers are now incarcerated in prisons in the southern States, and are there exposed to the peril of famine, diseases of different kinds, and hardships, whereby they are daily dying without aid or comfort; and whereas the rebel prisoners now confined in the United States are not exposed to these hardships, nor to the diseases incident to an unhealthy climate, by means whereof there is no reciprocity between the condition of our officers and privates taken prisoners and confined and the rebel prisoners in our possession; and whereas this state of things is most oppressive and unequal, and fatal to the lives and health of those who have been captured fighting for the Constitution and Union, and so impoverishing the strength of our armies: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to continue to use all his efforts, consistent with the honor and dignity of the nation, to procure a prompt exchange of prisoners with the rebel confederate government, and that if such exchange cannot be extended to all prisoners, that it may be carried into effect as to any portion that may be agreed upon between the parties.

The question was taken, and the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As I understand that this whole matter has been placed in the hands of General Butler, and feeling the most entire confidence that he will work out this problem, I propose to debate that resolution.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman debates it in this manner, I desire to reply to him, and to make an appeal to him in behalf of our imprisoned men.

The SPEAKER. As the resolution gives rise to debate, it goes over.

WILLIAM CLARK.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers in the case of the claim of William Clark be returned to the Court of Claims, with directions to said court to hear and decide the same.

REPORT ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. STROUSE submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That in order to afford more general information on the subject-matter, the special committee on immigration be instructed to print a proportionate number of copies of their reports in the German language for general circulation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should be glad to know what reports the gentleman refers to before I vote on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot inform the gentleman.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state, for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the select committee on immigration has not yet held a meeting. When it shall make a report, I have no doubt the House will agree with him, certainly I shall, in printing that report in the German language.

Mr. STROUSE. I was not aware that the committee had not held a meeting; but whether it has or has not, there can be no difficulty about this resolution. I merely ask, what I trust no gentleman here will object to, that, as this is an important matter, and as we are in want of this class of people to supply the great drain which has been made on our agricultural population by the war, and to enable the parties affected by this, through their friends here, who report to their relatives in the old country, and bring them here to clear the wild lands and assist in the cultivation of those already cleared, to have access to the reports of this committee, a certain number of those reports shall be printed in the language which these people understand. It certainly must redound to our general benefit.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman debates the resolution, it goes over, under the rule.

Mr. STEVENS. Does not the resolution go, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is intended to apply to extra numbers, it must go to the Committee on Printing. If it is intended simply to apply to the regular number printed simply for the use of the members, it need not have that reference.

Mr. STROUSE. I do want extra numbers.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution is referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. A. MYERS submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas, in the opinion of this House, the Federal Government is invested by the Constitution of the United States with all necessary power and authority to suppress any resistance, whether armed or unarmed, to the rightful power and jurisdiction of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in this national emergency Congress will forego all feeling of mere passion, except that which loyalty dictates, all resentment except such as is due to treason; and that this war of national self-defense against armed rebels, insurrectionary traitors, and sympathizing abettors should be waged on our part until such rebels and traitors are conquered into love for the Union, and made obedient to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and take the oath of allegiance to the country, and of submission to the emancipation proclamation, and the proclamation of December 8, 1863; and when those objects are accomplished, the leading rebels and chief traitors should be hung, and the war cease.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken on the resolution; and no quorum voted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the resolution shall, by consent, be referred to the special committee on reconstruction.

Mr. A. MYERS. I have no objection.

The resolution was so referred.

NAVY-YARD ON THE DELAWARE.

Mr. BROOMALL introduced an act to provide for the construction of a navy-yard and naval station on the Delaware river.

The bill authorizes and empowers the Secretary of the Navy to construct a navy-yard and naval station on the Delaware river, in the State of Pennsylvania, at such point as shall be most beneficial to the Government of the United States.

The second section provides for the appointment of a committee of seven practical and scientific men, none of whom shall reside or own property within fifty miles of the Delaware river or bay. This commission is to ascertain and fix, at once, a proper location. On the report of a majority of them, approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy is to procure the cession of the ground indicated, by the necessary deeds from owners and by legislative grants.

The third section appropriates $300,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONSTRUCTION OF MARINE ENGINES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs do investigate without delay and report to the House the facts in relation to the plans and structure of the marine engines constructed and now in course of construction for the Navy; and in what essential particular they differ from the marine engines heretofore used in the Navy and now used in the commercial steamers and the navies of France and England, and whether their inadequate power and speed are caused by such differences; and by whose authority, and on what experiments and under whose supervision such changes were introduced; and whether any unfair practices were resorted to by any person in or under the authority of the Navy Department, in the mode of running or handling or managing the engine of the Penacola, with a view to break it down and bring it and the plan on which it was built into disrepute; and whether any person connected with the Navy Department has received any fees or commission or compensation of any kind from any contractors for engines for the Navy, or compelled any payments of fees for patented improvements to persons not entitled to them, by persons connected with the Navy Department; and that the committee be authorized to require the opinion of the Academy of Sciences on any scientific question involved in their investigations and necessary to be solved in order to arriving at a satisfactory result; and that they have leave to report at any time; and that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

THE BRITISH SCHOONER GLEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the decree of the court of the United States for the southern district of New York, awarding the sum of $17,150 69 for the illegal capture of the British schooner Glen, and requesting that an appropriation of that amount be made as an indemnification to the parties interested; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill No. 40, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, be made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration, as a special order, of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The bill having been read through, the Clerk proceeded to read it by clauses for amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I see here appropriations for ministers to Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras, and San Salvador. I desire to know whether there are separate ministers for each of those States, or whether one minister does not perform the duties in all of them.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot say precisely how that fact is. I am inclined to think, however, that each of those States has a resident minister.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if he has not looked into that subject, to give it his attention. Hitherto, under preceding Administrations, we were accustomed to have but one minister to all those Central American States. The States are small, and travel through them has been much facilitated by the introduction of steamboats. I should think it unnecessary to have more than one minister for the whole of them.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is probably aware that the Committee of Ways and Means has no power to abolish any of these missions. We simply take the law as we find it, and report the appropriation. I do not see how we can do otherwise, at present, than pass the bill as it is.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report appropriations for missions provided for by law, but it is also the custom of the House, and has been, to my knowledge, for the last twenty years, to abolish missions by refusing appropriations for them.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman whether he supposes we can abolish, under the rules, any of those missions?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I know we can withhold the appropriations for them, and thus compel the recall of the minister. But we cannot, I suppose, change the law.

Mr. BROOKS. If we abolish the appropriation, of course there is no minister.

Mr. Chairman, hitherto for these small States I think under previous Administrations, but I cannot be sure of that, there was but one minister. In the olden time, certainly under the old Whig and Democratic Administrations of the Government prior to the Administration of General Taylor, there was but one minister appointed for these Central American States. One is amply sufficient to do all of the business that is necessary to be done. These positions are mere sinecures, and now, when the whole resources of the country are needed to carry on an important civil war, it seems to be wise on the part of the House to lessen these representatives as much as possible.

But, sir, the whole responsibility devolves, I know, upon the other side, and all that I can do is, as these appropriations come up, to call the attention of Congress to them. I do not want to make any party objection or party opposition. I wish to state facts, and the other side of the House can take the responsibility if it pleases.

Mr. STEVENS. I am quite sure that the gentleman from New York does not want to embarrass the House or the Administration in this matter. Nor do I suppose that the suggestion he makes, throwing the whole responsibility upon this side of the House, is intended for any demagogical purpose. I know that the gentleman is above that. I will simply say that these missions have been long established. They have not been established by this side of the House. They were established when that side of the House had to take the responsibility, and we are only now continuing appropriations to ministers which they have appointed and sent abroad. I do not see that it is wise for the House to refuse to pay them, nor do I think that this is the time, when we have so many interests everywhere, when we have so many troubles abroad, when these marauding vessels of the enemy are putting into all of these ports—I say that I do not think this is the proper time to withdraw our watchfulness from these places. When we have peace again, I hope that we will have less expenditures in this as in the other branches of the Government, but I ask whether it would be wise to interfere at this time with these appropriations? Our ministers there have so managed affairs that we have maintained, amidst great perplexities and great troubles, peace with all foreign nations. I suggest therefore that these appropriations ought to be voted. It is just and proper to continue these ministers.

Mr. COX. I have the floor, but I will yield to the gentleman from New York to make a motion.

Mr. BROOKS. I shall simply discharge my duty, and move to strike out "Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and San Salvador," and to insert in lieu thereof a provision for one minister to the States of Central America.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment. I am a little surprised that a gentleman representing the commercial metropolis of the United States should have made it. I am afraid that the gentleman's mind is going back to the early days when the importance of these Central American States was not developed, or they were not as well known as they are now. Some ten or twelve years ago we had a minister to Central America. I believe that he was appointed from my own State of Ohio. He went down there under President Tyler, and was not heard of for four years. He circulated from one portion to another. He was a lost man there—however, drawing his salary. He was of no use to the country, of no use to our citizens down there, and it is indispensable to have an American minister at each one of these Central American States, and has been so since the trouble upon the isthmus, and ever since we have endeavored to establish a transit from ocean to ocean. It is indispensable necessary to have these ministers, because they cannot travel readily from place to place there as in some other countries, as in Turkey—from Greece or Rome to Turkey. I am opposed to coalescing these various embassies. We need these men there for the purpose of protecting our citizens who are resident there, or who may go across the isthmus. Those countries are volcanic, politically and physically, and whenever a revolution takes place our citizens are placed in jeopardy unless we have a minister there.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio whether there is any Central American Government in existence?

Mr. COX. There is not.

Mr. STEVENS. So I supposed.

Mr. COX. These are all separate Governments. There is there a Government called the United States of Colombia, formerly New Granada, where we will have a minister at Bogota or Panama. These ministers are absolutely indispensable for the protection of our citizens; and in these times, when the ocean is made the scene of so many piratical exploits from one part of the ocean to the other, these old ranging-grounds of privateers, the Caribbean sea especially, will be the place chosen for their purposes, unless we have the ensign of the United States to protect our shipping and our interests.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to add one consideration to those already urged so strenuously by my friend from Ohio. The civil troubles in the United States have developed a deep-seated hostility in several of the European Governments, and one of them has intruded with armed power into Mexico, for the purpose of establishing upon our borders a monarchical government menacing the institutions of the United States. Before the breaking out of the rebellion France would not have thought it prudent to put a man in arms in Mexico for any such purpose.

The designs of the European Governments extend, in my judgment, to the whole of what the Emperor of the French terms "Latin America;" and if the United States mean that their influence shall meet European influence wherever it may see fit to show itself in Latin America, then there we must have our representatives near all those Governments. I think very possibly one gentleman might discharge all the ordinary duties relating to commercial matters among several of those Governments. The material thing is not the protection of our commerce, but the representation and protection of our political power, our political influence, and the interests of republican government, represented by the United States, and which, I take it, we mean to maintain in Central America, as well as in Mexico, when the time shall come.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I need hardly say that I regret to differ with my friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] whose susceptibilities I unfortunately and quite unintentionally wounded a day or two before the adjournment; or that I find partial compensation for it in being for once able to agree with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] who—though it is not exactly pertinent to this question—thinks conscription unconstitutional, and cites Dr. Lieber to prove what that distinguished man, in a recent letter to me, says he never believed or uttered—"that the draft was un-American and anti-democratic."

But to the point. It strikes me the motion now made is exceedingly inopportune, if it ever would have been a wise one. He who will read Stephens's Travels in Central America, will find there the story of a very long but interesting peregrination by an American minister in quest of the Government of Central America. He could not find it, and returned, to report that he had been utterly unable to find it, though he had traveled over the country once within its jurisdiction.

But there never has been a time, for reasons so ably assigned by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] as well as those given by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] when it was more important to have American influence near to or at the center of each of the States named in the gentleman's amendment. Settlement has in my judgment been unduly confined to the grain-growing regions of our country and the world. The time has come when commerce, manufactures, and perhaps higher interests than these, require tropical development and civilization. There is no lack of the productions of the temperate region; no lack of skill for their production. Commerce and industry often suffer from over-production of our staples, and are embarrassed for want of a market in which to exchange or dispose of the surplus; they also suffer from want of those tropical productions that enter into our commerce and manufactures, grace our tables, and make life agreeable. But the time has come when, under providential guidance, and led by providential events, we are to have a natural tropical expansion, and large bodies of our people are to go to the very States of Central America from which the gentleman would withdraw our representatives, bearing with them, if we will permit, our language, our laws, our thoughts, our habits, and our institutions.

The last year has given freedom to millions of a race whose ancestors came from a region near the sun. They occupy a portion of our States, in which they have been enslaved, and where they are despised. Make them free as we are to move at our will; make them enlightened enough to know where interest leads them and where nature invites them to settle, and the black men of the border States and of the northern States will, as I have intimated, carry thither our language, our laws, and our life, and will in time, I trust, establish our flag and our Government in the regions once known as Central America; for, alas! the doctrine of State sovereignty and the fact of secession have extinguished the republic.

He who will look at the map of America, and study the climate and resources of the region indicated by the gentleman who moves to strike out these States, and will also glance at the social and political life of those States, will see the inducements to emigration which that region holds out to those whose presence in our midst is, to say the least, not desirable to a majority of our people. Color is there a mere question of taste. It is in no degree a political or social question. Mr. Stephens, in the book to which I have referred, tells us that his first breakfast in Central America was taken under these circumstances: it was in British Honduras, at Balize. He had been told by a British merchant that he would find him lodgings, and would take him to introduce him to the "lady" under whose roof he was to find them. He found the "lady" to be a "mulatto woman." Having closed a contract with his future landlady, he accepted an invitation to breakfast with another British merchant. He found the merchant at one end of the table, his wife at the other; each had a British officer on the one side, and each a colored gentleman on the other; his seat was between the two colored gentlemen; he took it. But let him speak for himself. This Democratic representative of the United States Government, the appointee of President Van Buren, thus describes the incident and moralizes on it:

"On my way back I stopped at the house of a merchant, whom I found at what is called a second breakfast. The gentleman sat at one side of the table and his lady on the other. At the head was a British officer, and opposite him a mulatto; on his left was another officer, and opposite him also a mulatto. By chance a place was made for me between the two colored gentlemen. Some of my countrymen, perhaps, would have hesitated about taking it, but I did not. Both were well dressed, well educated, and polite. They talked of their mahogany works, of England, hunting, horses, ladies, and wine; and before I had been an hour in Balize I learned that the great work of practical amalgamation, the subject of so much angry controversy at home, had been going on quietly for generations; that color was considered mere matter of taste; and that some of the most respectable inhabitants had black wives and mongrel children, whom they educated with as much care, and made money for with as much zeal, as if their skins were perfectly white."

The incident purified our minister of some prejudice. May not the great events now occurring bless us to the same extent? I think that the publication of the journal of the travels of a minister in search of a past Government might do something to induce emigration to this region so rich in its resources and so undeveloped. At any rate, at a time when Nature and Providence are inviting a large emigration from our over-labored region to those States, with which commercial intercourse could be developed with so much advantage to both parties, let us not withdraw the presence and power of our Government from any one of them. Our fellow-citizens of African descent, freed by the rebellion, will not be long in Americanizing this to them congenial region, in which complexional differences do not affect the social or political position of a man, if we have the sense and humanity to give them a fair chance for culture and enterprise.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not intend to make any further remarks upon this subject, but there are some misunderstandings about geography, which I must correct in order to justify the remarks which I have already made.

In the first place, let me remark that the Isthmus of Panama is not a Central American State. We have a consul at Panama and a consul at Aspinwall, so that that isthmus is not only protected by a minister at New Granada, but also by the influence and authority of two consuls, one at Panama and one at Aspinwall. We have in this bill appropriations for consuls at San Juan del Sur, at Aspinwall, at Panama, and at Lagnayra, so that in that portion of New Granada which is at the isthmus, we have not only a minister, but the three or four consuls I have named. Let me add in regard to the States of Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and San Salvador, that no one of them has a population as large as that of many of the single wards of the city of Cincinnati, or the city of Philadelphia, or the city of New York. The sending, therefore, of five ministers, and five or six consuls to a small population of comparatively insignificant trade is certainly not necessary for commercial purposes, however it may be necessary for political purposes.

I believe I have replied in substance to the practical remarks of the gentleman who has opposed my amendment. As to the theoretical remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] at some more appropriate time and on a more appropriate occasion, I will be ready to discuss any of these interesting social and political topics which he has brought before the House. I dislike to make political speeches on any occasion, but I would much prefer to meet the gentleman and discuss the whole subject before the Union League of this city, than to occupy the time of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I would inquire whether the gentleman belongs to that association?

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, I am a Union man, not a "conditional Union" man, nor an "unconditional Union" man, but a constitutional Union man.

Mr. CHANLER. If it is not asking too much of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I would like to know what is the specific salary of each of these ministers and commissioners to Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria, Brazil, Mexico, and so forth.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, that question is fixed by general law. It would interrupt the business of the House too much to go into that matter now; but I will inform the gentleman on that subject at any time he will call at my room, where I have all the laws.

Mr. CHANLER. I am much obliged to the gentleman; but I hope it will be no difficulty for the honorable chairman to state whether there has been any increase in the rates of salaries provided for in this bill. That is the object I have in view.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh; I misunderstood the gentleman. I beg pardon. There is no increase of salaries provided for in this bill, nor has there been any increase during this Administration.

Mr. COX. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will see that there is an increase of over seven thousand dollars in this item. Last year the appropriation was $310,000. Now it is $317,800.

Mr. STEVENS. The salaries are the same. The number has been increased by one.

Mr. COX. The number of ministers?

Mr. STEVENS. There is, of course, a larger sum allowed than there was last year for the same number. Gentlemen will recollect that these salaries are paid in gold—they cannot be paid in any other way—and that the rate of exchange has increased.

Mr. COX. Then I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that this increase of $7,000 is in consequence of the increase in the rate of exchange?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know the exact amount for exchange; but the appropriation is increased on that account. The salaries themselves are precisely the same as before. We pay our ministers abroad precisely the amount paid them for years past; but in order to do so we are obliged to appropriate a little larger sum than we did last year.

Mr. CHANLER. Then the honorable gentleman will, no doubt, be able to answer another question: when this change took place?

Mr. STEVENS. When what took place?

Mr. CHANLER. I understand that an increase has been made in the appropriation. I now ask when that increase did take place.

Mr. STEVENS. That increase has been gradual during the time that the gentleman has not been noticing past events.

Mr. CHANLER. I thank the gentleman, but he does not know that.

Mr. STEVENS. For the last three years, if the gentleman will examine, he will find there has been a gradual increase in the rates of exchange; and it is, perhaps, as high now as it has ever been before.

Mr. CHANLER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his kindness in attributing to me a want of attention to public affairs. No doubt his authority is correct. But at the same time I ask him for a specific answer in respect to when this difference did take place. If the gentleman has calculated the rates of exchange for the purpose of drawing on the Treasury of the United States to meet that exchange, he must have begun at some fixed date, and it is not my part to know what that date is. It is his duty, I understand, to be able to answer such questions here. If he is unwilling to answer, let the matter rest there. I have done my part.

Mr. STEVENS. I have yet to learn that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to teach members of the House the laws of the land.

Mr. CHANLER. No, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Or the operations of currency. If that were to be undertaken by the Committee of Ways and Means it would be a serious task, especially to set some minds right. I respectfully decline to undertake that task now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I again thank the honorable chairman, but I do not like to interrupt the business of the House by either giving or receiving lessons or lectures. I am discharging a simple duty which the gentleman seems determined not to allow me to do, if his influence can be used to the contrary. I wish to know from the gentleman who acts as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what the increase in exchange is? If he does not wish to answer the question, I am satisfied.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I was not able to answer the question as to what minister had been added to the list since last year. I have sent for the book, and I now find that the additional minister is the one to San Salvador.

Mr. COX. What is the amount of his salary?

Mr. STEVENS. Ten thousand five hundred dollars for all resident ministers.

Mr. CHANLER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for deigning to answer.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I find in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth lines, "for the salary of the secretary of legation to Turkey, acting as interpreter, $3,000;" and then comes the following in the thirty-fourth line:

For expenses of the consulate in the Turkish dominions, namely: interpreters, guards, and other expenses of the consulates at Constantinople, Smyrna, Candia, Alexandria, and Beirut, $2,500.

If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has any analysis of that appropriation from the State Department, I should be glad to have it. I wish to know whether the first interpreter provided for is only for Constantinople, or whether others have to be employed for the other places named.

Mr. STEVENS. The first one is for Constantinople alone. Then there are expenses for interpreters for the other places which are indicated.

Mr. BROOKS. They are for consulates?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir. They do not all need interpreters. Sometimes they need an interpreter, and sometimes they do not, therefore interpreters are not engaged all the time, and are only paid as they are needed. I hope that this explanation is satisfactory to the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

For office rent for those consuls general, consuls, and commercial agents who are not allowed to trade, including loss by exchange thereon, $50,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out "$50,000," and to insert "$41,800." I do it for the purpose of making an inquiry. I find that there has been a steady increase in this item. In the appropriation bill for 1860, the amount for this purpose was $27,370. The appropriation made by the last Congress was $41,800. The appropriation sought to be made by this bill is $50,000. In this item, of no great importance, there has been an increase each year. It has more than doubled in the last three years. Unless there is some good reason for it, I think that the appropriation of the last Congress of $41,800 is entirely sufficient; for it seems to me that there is no reason why in such an item there should be an increase beyond the old appropriations, except as an increase coming from the number of consuls appointed abroad who are not allowed to engage in commerce, and of the number of ministers whose rights are here involved. In any event, the appropriation for this purpose during the last year of the Administration of James Buchanan, which was not regarded as an economical Administration, was only $27,370. This Administration, which came into power upon the alleged extravagance of that Administration, increased that amount. It seems to me, therefore, that the appropriation made by the last Congress for this purpose is amply sufficient. My motion is to strike out "$50,000," and in lieu of it to insert "$41,800," which was the amount appropriated at the last Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. The amount asked for is necessary to make up the losses of exchange, which we are obliged to do by the law in all of these cases. It is larger than it was for the last year. It is exactly calculated according to the number of consuls reported to us as having been appointed. The gentleman from Indiana will recollect that by a law passed by Congress the Secretary of State has the right to appoint new consuls in such places as, under the circumstances, he may deem proper. If the gentleman will look carefully into the matter he will find that the appropriation tallies with the number of consuls called for.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that the present law grants the power to the Secretary of State to appoint consuls abroad; but is there no limit to the exercise of that power? Is there no limit to the power of the President or the Secretary of State?

Mr. STEVENS. He has the power to make the appointments wherever he may deem them temporarily necessary. There is a general law on the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the same law regulate the pay of the consuls? How is the salary of these temporary consuls regulated?

Mr. STEVENS. The law provides that the salary shall be by fees, or at a fixed rate. The salary of these temporary consuls is fixed by the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of consuls general at Quebec, Calcutta, Alexandria, Havana, Constantinople, Frankfort-on-the-Main; consuls at Kanagawa and Nagasaki, in Japan, Liverpool, London, Melbourne, Hong Kong, Glasgow, Mauritius, Singapore, Belfast, Cork, Dundee, Demarara, Halifax, Kingston, (Jamaica,) Leeds, Manchester, Nassau, (New Providence,) Southampton, Turk's Island, Prince Edward's Island, Havre, Paris, Marseilles, Bordeaux, La Rochelle, Lyons, Moscow, Odessa, Revel, Saint Petersburg, Maranzas, Trinidad de Cuba, Santiago de Cuba, San Juan, (Porto Rico,) Cadiz, Malaga, Ponce, (Porto Rico,) Trieste, Vienna, Aix-la-Chapelle, Canton, Shanghai, Fouchou, Amoy, Ningpo, Beirut, Smyrna, Jerusalem, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Antwerp, Funchal, Oporto, Saint Thomas, Elsinore, Genoa, Basle, Geneva, Messina, Naples, Palermo, Leipsic, Munich, Leghorn, Stuttgart, Bremen, Hamburg, Tangiers, Tripoli, Tunis, Rio de Janeiro, Pernambuco, Vera Cruz, Acapulco, Callao, Valparaiso, Buenos Ayres, San Juan del Sur, Aspinwall, Panama, Laguayra, Honolulu, Lahaina, Cape Town, Falkland Islands, Venice, Stettin, Caudia, Cyprus, Batavia, Fayal, Santiago, (Cape de Verdes,) Saint Croix, Spezzia, Athens, Zanzibar, Bahia, Maranhani Island, Para, Rio Grande, Matamoros, Mexico, (city,) Tampico, Paso del Norte, Tabasco, Paita, Tumbes, Talcahuano, Carthagena, Sabaniillo, Omoa, Guayaquil, Cobija, Montevideo, Tahiti, Bay of Islands, Apia, Lanthala, Bristol, Cardiff, Malta, Saint John's, (Newfoundland,) Saint John, (New Brunswick,) Pictou, (Nova Scotia,) La Union, Barbadoes, Bermuda, Antigua, Nantes, Napoleon, Vendee, Nice, Lisbon, Gottenburg, Tehuantepec, Santos, Saint Catharine, Balize, Gaspe Basin, Valencia, Port Mahon, Martinique, Taranto, Santander, Galatz, Bilbao, Seio, Paramaribo, Macao, Stockholm, Ancona, Otranto, Swatow, La Paz, Bergen, Trinidad, Barcelona, Quebec, Maricao, Algiers, Port au Prince, San Domingo, (city,) Monrovia, Cape Haytien, Aux Cayes, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne; commercial agents at San Juan del Norte, Saint Paul de Loanda, (Angola,) Gaboon, Saint Marc, Curacao, and Amoor river, including the loss by exchange thereon, $450,000.

Mr. BROOKS. The salary of the consul general at Quebec is provided for twice in that paragraph.

Mr. STEVENS. That is an error. I move to strike out that paragraph, and to insert in lieu of it a new one furnished by the State Department.

Mr. BROOKS. I should like to see that in print before we are called to act on it.

Mr. STEVENS. There is no change. The appropriation is the same. The names are alphabetically arranged and errors corrected. There is no addition to it.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not like to interfere with the order of business, but I should like to have the amendment printed.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Now, sir, if the gentleman desires to move that the committee rise he can do so.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not press it, because I understand there is no new consulate inserted in this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire then to dispose of the bill now.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount of appropriation proposed by the amendment is the same as that contained in the original paragraph, I suppose?

Mr. STEVENS. The amount of appropriation is not mentioned in the amendment. It contains only a classification of the consuls general and commercial agents, and makes no alteration in the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the sum is the same, I shall move no amendment to it at this time.

Mr. STEVENS. I only moved to strike out all down to and including the words "Amoor river," leaving the appropriation just as it was.

Mr. HOLMAN. So that what remains of that section will be subject to amendment after this amendment is adopted?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment I proposed to move was to strike out the appropriation of "$450,000," and to insert the amount appropriated for this purpose last Congress, namely, $416,354. If that portion of this clause to which such an amendment applies is not to be stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the amendment will be more appropriate hereafter.

The amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS was then agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to strike out the words "four hundred and fifty thousand dollars," and to insert the words "four hundred and sixteen thousand three hundred and fifty-four dollars."

In proposing this amendment, I desire to call the attention of the House to the very remarkable fact of the rapidity with which these appropriations for managing our foreign relations are being increased. There had been some slight increase prior to the last session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, but at that time the entire appropriation for all the purposes indicated in this paragraph was $274,250, and the appropriation made for these same purposes at the last Congress, if I have got the correct data, was $416,354. Now the sum has increased to $450,000, nearly double since the beginning of this Administration. This shows a steady and very rapid increase in the appropriations for these purposes. If it is true that the reason, and the main reason, for this extraordinary increase is to be found in the increased rate of exchange, resulting from the depreciation of the currency, a question of very great importance, it seems to me, presents itself to the House, and that is whether, in view of the general policy of the Government and the manner in which the other employes of the Government of the United States are paid, it is right and proper to continue to pay these salaries of foreign ministers, all of which are large salaries and as ample as any paid to any officers under the Government, in gold or its equivalent in exchange, while all other citizens employed by the Government are paid in currency which is depreciated largely from the gold standard.

I cannot but remember that there is a gallant Army in the field, and that when the appropriation now sought to be made to the amount of $450,000 was only $274,150, and when we thought this latter item was a sufficient compensation for these employes abroad, we fixed the compensation of those gallant soldiers, who have now been fighting for the Government in this death-struggle for nearly three years, at the sum of thirteen dollars a month. And I have heard no proposition coming from the majority of the House to increase their pay for the purpose of bringing it up to the gold standard. And yet there is this large army of citizens abroad, located at pleasant places of resort and fashion in the Old World, in peaceful and pleasant pursuits, whom we are paying their ample salaries at the gold standard, while the soldiers who bear the weight of this fearful calamity which has fallen upon us, still receive only their small pittance of thirteen dollars a month, in a depreciated currency. I am not aware that our ministers and consuls abroad have rendered such extraordinary services to the Government as to be entitled to such a remarkable act of favor. Why, sir, these offices are sought for with great avidity. The number of applicants has always been enormous for these foreign appointments. These are places of leisure—places to which gentlemen desire to resort with their families for the purpose of engaging in new rounds of social life—amusements and fashions and sight-seeings unknown to their own country. Gentlemen of leisure and fortune receive these appointments, and especially desire them as passports into the fashionable and aristocratic society of other countries.

They are places where professional and worn politicians are to be sent for pleasant recreation; they are places of honor and distinction, with immense salaries; and yet the men who fill them are to be paid, as though no misfortune had fallen upon the nation, in gold or its value in currency, while every citizen who has rendered peculiar and extraordinary services in this fearful emergency receives his pittance of compensation in a depreciated currency to the amount established by law at a time when gold was the standard of value throughout the entire country. Is there any justice or republican equality in this? Is it to maintain these tendencies of public policy that your gallant Army has suffered and borne so much? No, sir, they have the first claim on your justice, if not upon your generosity and favor. Let their pay be increased to the gold standard before you favor the gentlemen of elegant leisure abroad.

I propose, Mr. Chairman, when the proper opportunity shall occur, to offer an amendment providing that all ministers, consuls, and other public agents employed abroad, shall be paid their salaries on the basis of the legal tender currency of the United States, dollar for dollar, and not upon the basis of the value of gold; and where they are paid through exchange, as they must generally be, that then they shall be paid a sum equal in value to their salaries in the legal tender currency of this country and actual expense of transportation, the true basis of exchange, and not in a sum equal to their salaries in gold, and then they will receive the same relative amounts with other officers and persons in the employment of the Government, and not their salaries in full in gold while all others receive a depreciated currency.

I do not see how it is possible, sir, for gentlemen to stand up in a Government like ours and advocate the payment of these foreign salaried officers in gold, dollar for dollar, when they see around this Hall and everywhere the worn-out and shadowy forms of men who for thirteen dollars a month, not paid in gold, but in our unfortunately depreciated currency, have been so long bearing the heat and burden of the day in the struggle to maintain the national life. Justice demands that you pay your soldier in gold or its equivalent in currency in preference to all others in the national service. But if this bill passes, you pay your foreign ministers and consuls, in their pleasant sinecures abroad, in gold at the rate of the old salaries, and the soldier in a currency depreciated nearly one half in value since his salary was fixed by law at thirteen dollars per month.

Mr. COFFROTH. I shall vote against this amendment, because I believe in the doctrine that when men accept high positions under the Government, they should have that standard of value which they were bound to receive at the time they accepted office. I shall therefore vote with my friend from Indiana for every bill and proposition that shall come up in this House to increase the wages of the men who have gone out to sustain the flag of our country. When the volunteer system was commenced at the breaking out of the rebellion, they agreed to go into the Army at the rate of thirteen dollars per month, when the standard value of money was gold and silver, and I shall vote for any proposition to increase their pay in greenbacks now so as to raise it to that standard. These men employed in foreign countries have left their homes and gone into the service of the Government under the impression that they were to receive their salaries in gold and silver, and now, when greenbacks have fallen below par, we ought to increase their pay so as to bring it up to the standard of gold and silver. I shall vote for this appropriation, believing that honesty and justice require that we should do what is right toward these men, as well as toward the men who are in our Army, and all others who are in the employment of the Government. If greenbacks go down to fifty per cent. or one hundred per cent. or one hundred and fifty per cent., the $3,000 a year which a member of Congress gets is only equal to $1,000 or $1,500. I want to keep up the standard, and therefore I shall vote for this appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I somewhat sympathize with the idea of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that some portion of these consuls might be dispensed with; and early in the session I took occasion to inform myself in relation to the facts, and I found that this is, perhaps, the best money expended by the Government. Under the present existing state of circumstances our own vessels, as well as the vessels of the rebels, frequent the ports of South America and of all other parts of the world, and it becomes necessary that this Government should be represented in order to maintain a proper public opinion in those places in favor of the United States Government; and I am happy to say that at the present moment all the smaller Governments in South America are cordially in favor of the present Government of the United States. In relation to this subject it has become necessary to increase the number somewhat, but to a very small extent; and that increase the gentleman from Indiana would, I am sure, if he were to investigate the subject, approve of.

As to the increase in cost, in consequence of the difference in exchange, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that it has been the practice, ever since the foundation of the Government, to pay any losses by way of exchange to our representatives abroad. It would be utterly impossible for us to get along in any other mode. It has always been the practice, and any gentleman can see how utterly valueless it would be to pay off our representative in Japan, for instance, in greenbacks.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Heretofore have we not merely paid the loss by simple exchange; and is not the proposition now to pay the difference between the legal currency of the United States and the gold standard; and is it not the depreciation of the currency that creates this extraordinary difference?

Mr. MORRILL. It is precisely what we have always paid, the difference in exchange, in order to remit gold to our representatives abroad. I hardly think, Mr. Chairman, that the question in regard to the pay of soldiers is pertinent to this bill, and therefore I will not argue it.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot agree with my friend from Indiana, as I usually do. I hope, however, that the time is not far distant when we shall have no difficulty in regard to the difference of value between gold and its paper representative. I wish that we could pay all the public officers, and particularly that we could pay the Army and Navy, in the coin of the United States. I wish that we could come down to paying in coin even the members of Congress. I certainly would not object to receiving my little salary in the coin of the United States. But we are at present, we have been, and we must continue to be for a long time, in a state of war, and have been compelled to incur enormous debts. I do not intend to discuss now the origin, the policy, or the conduct of the war. I speak simply of existing circumstances, of facts as they are, of the reason why the officers and privates of the Army and Navy, as well as the civil officers of the Government, are paid in paper money, which, by the laws of trade, is now depreciated. Yet we are in a position here entirely different from that of our diplomatic representatives abroad. Take any foreign post, from that of minister plenipotentiary of the first class down to the consular or vice consular agent, and all of them are located at points where nothing but coin can be used as circulating medium.

We do not pay these representatives any more now, as I understand, than we have paid them heretofore. Their salaries are fixed by law, and cannot be increased or reduced except by the action of Congress, approved by the President. In my humble judgment, it would be gross injustice to our diplomatic and consular representatives abroad to pay them less than they are allowed by law. If ever, in the history of the country, it was important to be fully and ably represented abroad, that time is now. I am free to say that, but for our large representation in different parts of the civilized and semi-civilized world, the status of the United States of America, and the peace of the United States of America in its intercourse with foreign nations, would not have been so well maintained. I believe firmly that much of the credit of that is due to the attention and care bestowed upon our intercourse by our representatives abroad for the last eight or ten years.

I said that we would be doing injustice to these gentlemen if we failed to pay them their salaries in gold. Take, for instance, our representatives in Japan, at Singapore, in the East Indies, on the Mediterranean, in South America, or at any of the capitals of Europe. Their expenses of living are very great. We pay them no more than we paid them before, although we do pay the difference between the value of gold and paper. They receive exactly the same as they received before. It would be a violation of contract on the part of the Government to ask one of these men with a salary of $5,000 to take $3,500.

I am opposed to extravagance. I would oppose any bill to increase salaries where I think such increase is not necessary and proper. But I am in favor of doing just and right by our servants, and particularly by those on whom we must rely to maintain the honor, character, and dignity of the United States of America. I am in favor of increasing the pay of the soldiers and sailors, and shall vote for any bill that may come before the House to raise the wages of those who sacrifice health, comfort, and lives in the defense of the Republic and the maintenance of her institutions. But I am opposed to shaving down the salaries of men who would be taken by surprise to find that they were to be paid in paper which they could not even redeem abroad. I trust, therefore, that gentlemen will consider these circumstances; and, with all due respect to my friend from Indiana, I hope he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment, and offer, instead of it, to amend by adding the following:

That all salaries of ministers, consuls, and other public agents employed abroad, shall be paid on the basis of the legal tender currency of the United States, and not in gold, or upon the basis of gold; the amount paid through exchange to be regulated by the nominal value of the legal tender notes, and not on their depreciation in reference to gold, actual expense of transportation only considered.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of order. The amendment is a change of the law, and is therefore, under the rules, not in order to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It changes no law. It only proposes to pay these officers of the Government in the legal currency of the country, and also the cost of transportation abroad to their posts. The law fixes the salary of our foreign ministers and consuls. It also provides for paying them the loss by exchange. I am not sure that that is provided for. This does not change the law, but proposes to pay them in the legal currency of the United States. It is in conformity with law. The difference between our currency and gold is its depreciation, and is not the amount of the loss of exchange. I hold, therefore, that my amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and rules the amendment out of order. The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of commissioners and consuls general to Hayti and Liberia, $11,500.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out so much of the appropriation as provides for the commissioners to Hayti and Liberia. I move to strike out the words "commissioners and," and reduce the appropriation from $11,500 to $7,000. I offer the usual motion, Mr. Chairman, which I have offered ever since this was first provided in an appropriation bill, and I shall continue to do so so long as I have a seat upon this floor. I do not think that it is a proper appropriation. I do not think that it has any beneficial effect in a commercial point of view.

We all know that these missions to Hayti and Liberia were originated for a political and a partisan object, so avowed at the time the law was brought forward in this House. It does not seek the extension of our commercial intercourse, for that is provided by consuls and not commissioners. It was avowed as a political and partisan object when the proposition was first brought before the House.

Mr. KELLEY. Who avowed that as the object of the establishment of these missions to Hayti and Liberia?

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Gooch,] at the time the bill was up for discussion, very frankly and boldly avowed the object to be to establish an equality between the white republic and the black republic.

Mr. KELLEY. I deny it. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to point out the record of any such remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts or any other gentleman on this side of the House. There is no such thing.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says that there is no such thing. Why does he not appeal to the record? I would rather have the recollection of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I asked him whether he would not accept an amendment to provide for commercial appointments of consuls, &c.? He replied that he wanted ministers to Hayti and Liberia. He said that that side had no objection to a black minister to this country if this side had. He said that he had none himself. I remember that the distinguished member from Kentucky, Mr. Crittenden, since dead, expressed his astonishment that gentlemen on the other side desired to have black ministers at this Government. Our side of the House stood up for our own race—for the dignity and the decency of that race which has carved out the glory and the prosperity of this country. I am earnest on this subject.

My amendment will do away with these commissioners, and leave the consuls there with their proper salaries. It will do away with the tomfoolery of having black ministers at the White House, which was started originally, as I have stated, for mere party purposes.

There is a black minister here from Hayti—does he do anything? Gentlemen said when the law was passed that he would make a treaty with this country, and that we would in consequence gain great commercial advantages. That was the argument I think of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Was this made an issue in the recent election in Ohio?

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Illinois was very quick to interrupt me. I do not know whether it was an issue in the last election, but it was in the election shortly after. The law passed when we were all reelected. I am therefore now only carrying out the wishes of my constituents in moving to strike out these black ministers.

I was about to say that there was no commercial purpose to be subserved by these ministers that could not be subserved by consuls. It was said when the law was passed that treaties would be made by the ministers from Hayti and Liberia. It soon came out that treaties had been made in London by Mr. Adams, our minister to England, of course on information furnished by consuls. This expenditure of money to keep up a colorable relation with these black republics is not necessary—it is for a purpose that can be more profitably kept up by consuls. I believe that the salary is $7,500. My friend from Massachusetts can tell me whether that is so or not.

Mr. GOOCH. It is the same amount as is paid to the commissioners to other countries. The gentleman has made a speech in favor of continuing ministers to places with which I believe there is less actual commercial intercourse than there is between the United States and Hayti and Liberia.

Mr. COX. But there is more political significance in those to which the gentleman refers. When this war is over I trust that the military element left will sweep this continent from the Canadas to the isthmus. I want American representatives at the Central American States. I want to see the Government expand in the right direction. We have had contraction enough.

I hope—I know the hope is dim—for a better day, when the old policy of a reunited Republic shall prevail, and expansion, instead of contraction, shall be the paramount idea of the Republic.

Mr. GOOCH. The gentleman from Ohio is entirely mistaken when he says I avowed or acknowledged that any partisan consideration entered into the action of this House when the recognition of Hayti and Liberia was under consideration during the last Congress. I made no such statement; no such admission. The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, now deceased, (Mr. Crittenden,) I recollect at that time argued against the recognition of Hayti and Liberia because, he said, it involved a recognition of the equality of the two races. I answered him it involved no such thing; that it involved simply a recognition of the equality of rights of the two races. I recollect of thinking then, whether I said it or not, that he must be a very mean white man who was unwilling to acknowledge that the black man had an equality of rights with him because he feared the black man might excel him in the race of life, and attain to positions which he desired to occupy.

Now, I am aware the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] never lets an opportunity slip to move to strike out the salaries which have been fixed for the ministers to Hayti and Liberia. And it must be, as the gentleman has avowed it to be this morning, simply upon the ground that that republic is a republic of black men and not of white men. It can be upon no other consideration, for he has argued here this morning in favor of appropriations to pay ministers at several foreign countries where our intercourse is very much less with each one of them than it is with Hayti or Liberia.

I for one cannot understand why any gentleman can object to the recognition of the fact that Hayti is an independent Government, a Government which has maintained itself for more than half a century. I say I cannot understand why any gentleman should object to the recognition of that fact, especially since we have established and are now maintaining all the relations between this Government and Hayti which exist between any Governments upon earth. If they are a part of the family of nations, they have political rights in common with all others, and I think the Government of the United States should be the last one to fail to recognize those rights, or fail to accord to them that simple measure of justice which it has accorded to all other Powers of the earth.

The gentleman [Mr. Cox] speaks of the expansion of this country. He intimates that gentlemen upon this side of the House have been opposed to that expansion. I deny it. I believe gentlemen on this side of the House are as much in favor of the extension and expansion of the power of this Government as are gentlemen upon the other side; but they desire it shall expand upon principles which can be recognized and justified by all mankind. While they desire to extend this Government and give the benefits of it to those now perhaps out of its legitimate jurisdiction—or would be willing to do so under proper circumstances—they also desire that every man within its jurisdiction shall have the rights that belong to each man that God has made. That is the expansion we desire, and the expansion we mean to have. We mean that this Government shall expand; but we mean first it shall be administered on such principles that its expansion, wherever it goes, shall carry with it freedom and not slavery to every man, no matter what his color, complexion, or condition.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Ohio certainly knows that the motion he has made is not very much in order. The places of these ministers are established by law, and these Governments are recognized among the nations of the earth. Ministers to them have been appointed under laws already in existence. The gentleman knows it is the duty of the committee, and the duty of the House, to make appropriations to pay salaries of ministers appointed by law, and that we should be violating our duty if we rejected the appropriation. The gentleman knows that, but nevertheless he proposes an amendment which he thinks an excellent thing to hang a political speech upon; and that question which was decided two years ago, when Hayti was admitted by us to be one of the nations of the earth, is now revived, when in my judgment it should not be disturbed. I have nothing to say, sir, in regard to the association of the gentleman from Ohio, or anybody else, with a black minister from Hayti. There is no law to compel it that I know of, and if such a minister should happen to visit the White House I trust the gentleman will never be in a position when he will be obliged to receive him. [Laughter.] He will not be compelled to receive him unless he is in such a position. It will be a matter of election altogether.

I know, sir, there is a particular party in this country, as well as sporadic cases in all parties, that look a great deal more in their associations to the accidental color of the skin or the shape of the face than to the intellect and merit of the human beings with whom they are called upon to associate, and that that is made one of the grand cardinal principles of a great party in this country.

Now, sir, I do not know that ever I shall come across men of dark color of the same intelligence as white men. I have seen some that I thought not much inferior to most of us, and I, for my part, have no kind of bashfulness in talking to such a gentleman, if he talks politely, as they usually do; but it is a matter of taste altogether. I hope, however, that we shall not be less liberal than a very rich colored merchant in Jamaica that I heard a gentleman from Boston, who had dined with him, speak of. He said, in the course of conversation, to this gentleman, a highly intelligent and very rich man with whom he was dining, that he had no prejudices about color; that he would never prefer a man of color, and that he would just as soon dine with a man as white as his table-cloth. [Laughter.] It made no difference to him. But we have these prejudices, and cannot rise above them; we must bring them into politics; we must talk as if one party preferred these associations to another. There is no such thing, sir, in this country. It is mere political slang. Who shall be our associates are questions of our own choice, our own taste. Our political laws are either to give equal rights to every human being, or they are to crush the one and elevate the other upon his ruin. Let those who still adhere to the latter notion carry it out; but, sir, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gooch] that although this Republic will expand over this continent, so also will the principles of liberty expand, and they will not be confined by Mason and Dixon's line or by any other line, but will spread throughout the whole continent and over every human soul upon its soil.

The question was taken on Mr. Cox's amendment, and it was rejected.

The Clerk read the following clause:

For expenses, under the act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and her Britannic Majesty, for the suppression of the African slave trade, $17,000.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, because, in the time I have had to examine this bill, I have not been able to understand this appropriation precisely, but, very likely, he will be able to explain it. I find that in the act of the 11th of July, 1863, there was an appropriation to carry out this treaty with Great Britain, providing for the payment of salaries to three judges—one at New York, one at the Cape of Good Hope, and one at Sierra Leone—of $2,500 each, and three arbitrators, one at New York, having $1,000, and each of the others $2,000. That makes $12,500, and I do not find any law or any explanation beyond what I state, why this appropriation should be $17,000 rather than $12,500. I desire to inquire why the amount is thus increased?

Mr. STEVENS. We appropriated $17,000 last year, it seems to me.

Mr. KERNAN. That is true. I looked at that; but there is no explanation why the amount was increased.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I presume there were other expenses beyond the salaries, and it was to include those that we made the additional appropriation.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to suggest that the law provides for no other expenses, and the estimates give us no details. I do not, of course, mean to insinuate that the appropriation is not correct, and yet it seems to me that we ought not to vote it on the assumption that it is right, particularly when the estimates call for no such appropriation to carry out the treaty.

I agree with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that where the law fixes a salary, we are not, in appropriating it, creating the salary, but only voting the money to pay it; but the law, in this case, only provides for salaries amounting to $12,500, and it seems to me that we should ascertain from some source where the remaining $4,500 goes before we vote it. I move to strike out “$17,000,” and to insert, in lieu thereof, “$12,500.”

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PENDLETON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 40, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was adopted, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, the petition and papers of Alexander Hays were withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. RANDALL, of Virginia, presented the supplemental memorial of John Kline, contesting the seat of Leonard Noyes, of Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BLOW submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That, for the purpose of paying proper tribute to the memory of Old Hickory, the general who took the responsibility of hanging spies under the "second section," and of suspending the habeas corpus in the hour of our country's peril; the statesman who issued his proclamation against the nullifiers of South Carolina, and who would have hung the chief progenitor of rebels had he not been prevented by the humanity of Henry Clay; who foresaw that after the struggle on the question of paying duties on sugar the next pretext of the disunionists would be on the question of slavery; and who said, with peculiar emphasis, that "the Union must be preserved," this House when it adjourns will adjourn over the 8th of January to Monday next.

Mr. COX. I move to amend so as to make it Monday instead of Saturday.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. There is an aspersion upon the memory of Henry Clay which I hope to see stricken out before the resolution is adopted.

Mr. COX. I want the adjournment over in honor of Jackson without whereases and conditions.

Mr. BLOW. I accept the amendment of Monday as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. MARCY. I deny the right of any one on that side of the House to eulogize the memory of Andrew Jackson.

Mr. ANCONA. I propose to debate the resolution, and it must go over, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. That point comes too late. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. COFFROTH, the House (at twenty minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 8, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRICT LAWS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of Richard S. Coxe, commissioner to revise the statutes of the District of Columbia, made in pursuance of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I present the petition of A. S. E. Spring and others, citizens of Portland, Maine, praying that the petition of the South American Steamship Company, asking aid for the purpose of establishing postal communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America, may be granted. I do not know whether that has been presented or not.

Mr. HALE. I presented it yesterday, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I move that this be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Dr. Usher Parsons, and others, citizens of Providence, Rhode Island, praying for the organization of a special ambulance corps of non-combatants for the service of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FOSTER presented the memorial of C. S. Bushnell, and others, citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, praying that the petition of the South American Steamship Company, asking for aid to establish postal communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America, may be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Dr. Gorden W. Russell and others, citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, praying for a uniform ambulance and hospital system for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Thomas Crown, praying to be allowed damages occasioned by the abrogation of a contract made by him with Captain Blaney to furnish bricks for the fortifications at Oak Island, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mrs. Aña M. Roblas y Robaldo, widow of F. Robaldo, praying to be paid for certain property destroyed by American troops in Mexico, by order of their commanding officer, in the late war with Mexico, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks, and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 3) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker and Major General George G. Meade, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and the officers and men who have fought under his command, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of R. G. Murphy for relief, to ask the Senate for power to send for persons and papers in that case. It is a case involving a question of fraud, and it is necessary for the committee to have the persons and some papers before them for a proper examination of the matter. Leave was given at the last session for that purpose, but owing to the absence in the Army of one person whom we desired to have before us, it was thought best by the committee not to summon at that time. I move that the committee have leave at this session.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 40) to define the pay of the officers of the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 42) repealing certain statutes of limitation; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 43) relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 44) granting a pension to the widow of Major General H. G. Berry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 11) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas, and the officers and men who fought under his command at the battle of Chickamauga; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 12) requiring the President of the United States to give the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE. I wish to present a resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration, so far as to allow me to make a statement explanatory of it, and then, if there shall be any objection to it, it can lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire submits a resolution, which will be read for the information of the body; and he asks the unanimous consent of the Senate for its consideration at the present time. It will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the present condition of the Navy, the efficiency of the steam-engines lately constructed and now being constructed for the use of the Navy, the mode and manner of procuring supplies for the Navy, and the conduct of the Department generally; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. I desire now simply to make an explanation to the Senate of the reason why I introduce this resolution in this form. There has been furnished to me, and it has been extensively circulated in the newspapers, particularly of the city of New York, the report of an argument made in a case pending in the supreme court of this District by Mr. Dickerson, a counselor of some reputation in the city of New York, in which he gives facts, dates, and figures going to show a total and entire misapprehension of what is due to the Navy in the construction of its steam engines, and represents the whole thing as an entire failure. The paper not only does that, but it represents that the vessels which have been constructed under this mode of engineering are a total and lamentable failure, and that the $70,000,000 which have been and are now being expended are worse than useless, as the Navy Department is now administered.

There are also in the same paper statements that would go to show corruption in some of the officers of the Department. It is a paper the importance of which cannot be winked out of sight, and I think it should be met. I should have been glad if the Secretary of the Navy, or the actual Secretary of the Navy, as he is called, had called for an investigation himself. It has only been answered by an anonymous communication, from the Department as I have been informed, in one of the New York papers. I think the controversy is one that concerns the country and the nation. We are called upon to appropriate about one hundred and seventy million dollars this year for the Navy, and if anything at all approximating to the truth is contained in this statement, it is a controversy that goes above any personal controversy between Mr. Isherwood and Mr. Dickerson, the author of these papers.

So far as the proposed investigation is concerned, I feel it my duty, occupying the place I do, to call the attention of the Senate to it. When I have done this, I will say further that I shall be exceedingly grateful to the Senate if they will devolve this inquiry on a select committee. I have no disposition to take the matter into my own hands, nor have I any wish to shrink from what I conceive to be the proper discharge of my duties. I call the attention of the Senate to it. The attention of the country it will have, and it has had. While I do not indorse one of these statements, and know not whether they are true or not, I deem it my duty to say that I believe, from the intercourse I have had with men who are conversant with this matter, that there is an utter feeling of heart-sickness and despair at the prospects of the Navy as it is at present conducted. Whether that feeling is well founded or not, I do not know; but I submit this resolution to the Senate. If there is a single member who prefers that the investigation should be committed to a special committee, he will do me the greatest favor to move it; but if there is not, I leave this resolution for the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not prepared to vote in favor of this investigation at the present moment. I should like to have the resolution laid over until I can inquire a little into the subject. If it lies over until Monday, I shall have no objection to its coming up then.

Mr. HALE. I have not the slightest objection, sir. I have done my duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the resolution until Monday next.

Mr. GRIMES. I hardly think it is necessary to postpone the resolution. I think I feel authorized to say for the Navy Department that they court the most thorough investigation into all the charges that have been preferred against the management of that Department; and whenever a thorough investigation shall be made, it will turn out, in my conviction, that we not only have as fast, but faster vessels in the Navy of the United States than in any navy of the world. I undertake to assert, from my own information on the subject, that there is no navy in the world that to-day has as fast vessels as there are in the Navy of the United States, and whenever there shall be a fair investigation of that subject, it will be so demonstrated to the Senate and to the country. Under such circumstances, I, as a friend of the Navy and of the Navy Department, trust that the resolution of the Senator will be adopted in some form, and adopted at once. As to whether the committee to make the investigation shall be the standing Committee of the Senate on Naval Affairs, or a select committee, that is for the Senate to determine.

That there may have been frauds perpetrated in the Navy Department by persons connected with it, I do not pretend to deny; that the best men may always have been selected for the performance of their duties, I do not assert; but I do assert that, from the very commencement of this war to the present moment, it has been managed as well as any Department, yea, better than any Department in this Government; and such, Mr. President, will be the impartial record that the history of this country will contain twenty years hence.

And now let me say one word while I am up in regard to a subject that was introduced to the Senate yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis,] and that is in regard to the Morgan, steamers. The fact has been demonstrated by the events of the last two years that the Morgan-purchased steamers were the cheapest and best that have ever been bought for this Government either for the Army or for the Navy Department. The only thing there was in connection with that transaction for which the Secretary of the Navy was properly censurable, in my opinion, was the principle which he laid down as being the one upon which purchases of that kind ought to be made, not that there was not perfect success in the purchases. Among the very best purchased vessels at this day in the Navy of the United States are some of those very Morgan-purchased steamers. A vessel that performed, according to the official reports, most important service—I was going to say the most important service—at the capture of New Orleans, the Varuna, under the command of the gallant Captain Boggs, was one of the Morgan-purchased steamships. I did not then and I do not now recognize as correct the principle laid down by the Secretary of the Navy in regard to the payment of agents who might be selected, or the manner in which they were paid. I would rather have paid directly out of the Treasury the amount of money that was received by the agent of the Government, Mr. Morgan, than to have had him receive it in the way that it was received; but that the purchases were made for the benefit of the Government, I do not doubt.

Then there is another little part of the unwritten history of this country, Mr. President, that ought to be stated in this connection. Mr. Welles, the Secretary of the Navy, has not a very great disposition to engage in controversy. He would much rather be abused than fight back. He might have stated, and I think in justice to himself and the country he ought to have stated, that the commercial men of New York appealed to him, and to all the members of the Cabinet, to employ one man rather than many men to purchase vessels for the United States Government, because, they said, if you select ten or a dozen men, or one or two even, in Boston, and one or two in New York, and one or two others in Philadelphia, and one or two in other commercial ports to go into the market and engage in the purchase of vessels, you will raise the price of vessels so much that you will interfere with the commerce of the country. Now, you should employ one man, and unite with him skillful naval officers to investigate the condition of the vessels, and let that one man quietly go around and purchase as many vessels as you desire. It was upon that suggestion that one man was appointed rather than many men selected throughout the country to make these purchases. The Secretary of the Navy has never taken the trouble to state to the country the influence under which he acted when he selected Mr. Morgan rather than selected ten or a dozen different agents to be employed in this kind of business.

In regard to the subject now under consideration, the investigation of the steam-engines built for our naval vessels, it is a matter with which practically I am totally unacquainted. I have taken the trouble to read the logs of some of the vessels that have been built for the Navy as fast vessels. When I was in Charlestown a short time ago, I went on board the Ticonderoga, that had just come in from a voyage, and I talked with the chief engineer, who was a citizen of the town in which I live, and he told me that that vessel had made thirteen and a half knots in a sea-way during the voyage from the West Indies to Boston. When Mr. Dickerson or any other person can make an engine that will propel a war steamer, which is compelled to carry her heavy armament and her supplies for men for a six months' cruise and all her commissary stores and quartermaster's stores and all her ordnance, at a greater speed than thirteen and a half knots in a sea-way, I shall be willing to confess that his suggestions ought to be attended to, and that the gentleman who is now in charge of the Navy Department should be turned out. I do not say that the man who is now in charge of the Steam Engineering Bureau is the proper man. I know that there are a great many prejudices against him. But that there has been any sort of collusion between him and the head of the Navy Department I do not believe, and I feel warranted in denying; or that there has been any fraud perpetrated by Mr. Isherwood, with the knowledge of the Navy Department, or which it was within the power of the Navy Department to prevent after it was brought to their attention, I am not prepared to admit.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I want to say, in answer to any suggestion here, that I have not indorsed any of these statements; but I have brought them before the Senate because I thought it was my duty to do so. The publicity given to these statements is such that they will have the attention of the country, and ought to have the investigation of the Senate. I shall be exceedingly relieved, however, if my friend from Wisconsin, or anybody else, will suggest a special committee instead of the Naval Committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, all this I confess is new to me, and it is based mainly on a pamphlet which the honorable Senator found lying on his table and which I find lying on mine—a pamphlet which I have had no opportunity whatever to read, and I therefore desire that this question shall lie over until Monday next. I doubt whether there is sufficient foundation to make this inquiry; but if there be, I shall not have any objection to the question going to a committee for the purpose of inquiry. I have no doubt that the Navy Department is honestly conducted, certainly so far as the head of that Department is concerned, for I have as much confidence in the integrity of the head of that Department as I have in any man of my acquaintance, and I have not the slightest doubt of the integrity of the Department itself.

But, sir, these inquiries, unless they be necessary, do not, in the present state of public affairs, result in any great good to the country. The institution of an inquiry like this is a blow at the confidence of the country in the administration of the Government, if a charge is made that there is fraud in the heads of Departments of the Government unless there be foundation for making the charge. Therefore, certainly, before we go into an investigation, we ought to have some reasonable grounds for believing that such a charge is well founded. I do not say that the Senator from New Hampshire has made that charge, but he seems to base his motion on a charge which somebody else has made that there has been fraud in the administration of the Navy Department. I do not desire, at this stage of our affairs, to sanction such charges, unless upon investigation we find that there is some reasonable ground for believing that they exist.

I know that my honorable friend from New Hampshire is just as anxious, and probably no more anxious than other Senators on this floor to prevent frauds in the administration of the Navy Department. I believe, however, that he is sometimes imposed upon by representations that are made to him, and under the influence of those representations he sometimes in the heat of debate makes wholesale charges against the Administration, which are repeated, not only throughout the country, and in the press of the country, to destroy the confidence of the people in the administration of the Government, but we heard them read here yesterday on the floor of the Senate for half an hour—charges of the most flagrant description against the administration of the Government—charges which I then believed were without foundation, and I believe now are without foundation. But they were repeated by the gentleman from Kentucky, read, and read again; for what purpose but to destroy the confidence of the people in the administration of the Government?

Now, Mr. President, I desire that this resolution shall lie over until Monday. In the mean time I will look into the pamphlet upon which this motion seems to be based, and if I become satisfied that there is any foundation for the charge, or any probable cause for believing that there is really a charge, I shall not object to empowering a committee to send for persons and papers and occupy all the session, if they choose, in the investigation.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree, sir, with the Senator from Wisconsin that this subject should lie over until Monday, and I doubt not that then the Senate may conclude that it should lie over longer, or that if an investigation is to be made, it should be made in some other manner than that proposed by the resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

I agree fully and entirely in the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin, that there is nothing that strikes deeper or more fatally at the Government in its fair and full administration than these constant and repeated attacks from those who profess to be its friends. I confess, Mr. President, that I was very much surprised to hear the Senator from New Hampshire introduce his resolution with the remark that the country was heart-sick—that was his expression—at the manner in which the affairs of the Naval Department of this Government are being administered. I totally disagree with that belief thus firmly expressed by the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not believe that it pervades the country. If it did, it would indeed be one of the worst signs of the times—far worse than the strongest attempts of organized rebellion against the power and existence of the Government, for there is nothing that lies deeper as a crime against the Government than this constant sapping of the confidence of the people in the officers that are chosen for its administration. As the Senator from Wisconsin very properly said, we had repeated here yesterday a speech already two years old, making charges of the most terrible character against the Navy Department. I doubt not, sir, that they were unpleasant when repeated, to the Senator from New Hampshire; they were certainly unpleasant to me. The Senator from Kentucky should not be furnished with such data from a loyal source, unless those data be founded in fact, incontrovertible in character; and then, where that is the case, it becomes the highest duty of the most loyal men in the country to investigate and put an end to that class of abuses. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not object to my use of the term "loyalty," because there is a propriety in the use of that term toward Government. Loyalty to friends, fealty to truth, fealty to Government, to those who administer it when engaged in the rightful administration of it, is, in my opinion, one of the highest characteristics that can grace a patriot.

I object, sir, for one, to the mode of investigation which is here proposed. I say that if an investigation is to be had in regard to a subject of this kind, it should be committed to men, chosen perhaps under a resolution of this body, or of Congress, directing the President of the United States to select a board of competent engineers to make the investigation, and to ascertain whether our ships are fast enough or too slow, whether the means adapted to the great end of securing speed are sufficient or insufficient; but I entirely object to these accusations and these investigations furnished and based upon the yellow-covered literature that is so often spread upon the desks of Senators and members of the House of Representatives. I do not know the person who has written this pamphlet. I shall not be made acquainted with the value of his facts after I shall have read it. But what I most object to are the statements that are based upon it and given as the faith of the Senator from New Hampshire, who occupies here the high position of chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the country is heart-sick with the administration of this Department of the Government. I hope that the Senator will feel it to be his duty to take back that expression. I think that it ill becomes him or any other Senator to make so broad an assertion here. It is time, sir, that we were done trifling with this class of accusations, so loosely made, upon matters of the deepest importance and consequence. I hope the subject will lie over for mature consideration and action.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if I made the expression as broad as the honorable Senator from California has put it, I certainly will withdraw it. The position which I took was that I believed the country was heart-sick at the failures in the construction of these steam-engines, and not in regard to the administration of the Navy Department generally; I do not know whether my language was as guarded as it should have been. I believe that there are in the Navy Department not only as honest, but as efficient and capable officers as there are in this Government or any other, but the failure to which I alluded and of which I said, so far as my observation extended, the country was heart-sick, was in regard to the construction of steam-engines.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I should, while up, have also taken exception, as I felt disposed to do, to another form of language used by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, when referring to the Navy Department. I understood him directly to cast a reflection upon its head by referring to its "so-called head." I hope, sir, as I before said, that these attacks will not be continued. If it shall be shown, or can be shown by indubitable facts, that there is maladministration in that or any other Department, the Senator from New Hampshire can have my vote and voice in its correction, and in the application of that correction at the earliest moment of time; but I say let the faith of the people in those who administer its Government at this time not be unnecessarily broken. I protest against everything that goes to that end.

Mr. HALE. In regard to this matter I must say that I differ with anybody who thinks that the charges brought are brought in such a way that they ought not to be noticed. I think they ought; and I think that the honorable Senator from Iowa, speaking, as he says, for the Navy Department, is right when he says that they court a full investigation upon them.

I wish now to say a word in reply to what fell from my friend from Wisconsin in regard to a charge which is certainly new to me; and that is, that I have made wholesale charges against this Administration. I deny that I ever made any charge against the Administration, or that I ever made any wholesale charges against the Secretary of the Navy. It is a little singular that such a charge as that should be brought. Two years ago, by the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I brought distinctly before the Senate a particular transaction in which names and dates and figures were given. That report was made after the matter had been referred to the Secretary of the Navy, and his own account had been given to the Senate of the transaction; and that, and that alone, was everything in which I differed with the Secretary of the Navy, or with any other part of this Administration.

But, Mr. President, let me tell the honorable Senator from California, and every other Senator on this floor, that they will do infinitely more to weaken public confidence in the Administration whenever there is an attempt to shrink from a proper and fair investigation of its concerns. The transactions of the Navy Department, and of every other Department, should be open as day; and they should ever be ready to meet any and every investigation touching its conduct; and they do nothing more than justice to themselves and to the country when they ask such an investigation.

I distinctly averred when I first rose that I made no voucher for any of these charges; but how shall we know whether the Department is well administered or not, if, when charges are made, and publicly made, made in a court-room, made in the press, made not by an anonymous publication, but by an individual who gives his name, we refuse to investigate them? If the Senate can see any other mode than the one I suggested they will relieve me abundantly, and gratefully would I receive any action of the Senate that should give this investigation any other turn than that it should come to myself, or to the committee of which I am a member. I do not desire it. It is a burden from which I would gladly be relieved; but while I would gladly be relieved from it, I will not shrink from it. I have done nothing but what I conceive to be my duty, and my plain and obvious duty, and I ask nothing more. I do not ask the Senate to indorse these charges. I do not ask them to order an investigation at my motion. The matter is before the Senate. Every Senator has as much interest in it as I have. Every Senator is as much interested in the purity of the Administration, and in the purity of the administration of all its Departments, as I am. I ask nothing; I indorse nothing; I simply lay the facts before the Senate. If the Senate thinks them not worthy of investigation I am perfectly content, as I am that it shall be taken up next Monday or any other day the Senate thinks proper.

Mr. DAVIS. I had not intended to say a word on this occasion, but I have been referred to so repeatedly, and especially by the honorable Senator from California, that I feel it imperative upon me to say a few words.

Mr. President, I have remarked from the time I first took my seat in this body, the extreme restiveness, the impatience, the perfect revulsion with which the questioning of any of the acts of this Administration is received by its peculiar friends. I tell the honorable Senator, and all other Senators, that they may as well learn to submit to it at once. The acts of the Administration are the proper subjects of investigation, and while I have a seat on this Senate floor, and have reason and voice, they shall be investigated to the extent of my poor abilities. I shall do it in a manner, according to my judgment, that becomes a Senator and a man; but I intend to do it, let the consequences be what they may. Why, sir, has it come to this, that the acts of an Administration of a great Government organized and instituted by the people, based upon a free Constitution and upon the great principle of popular government, cannot be investigated by those who differ from its line of policy, without incurring the vehement denunciation of the advocates of the Government, as it is termed? I protest against any such principle or any such practice as that. When it becomes inaugurated and installed as the course that members in the opposition are to take in relation to this or any other Administration, then liberty is gone forever. While there is life in me, I will never submit to such a principle as that.

The Senator says that it ill becomes gentlemen, and especially referring to the Senator from New Hampshire, to endeavor to weaken the confidence of the country in the high officers who are administering the Government. Sir, there is something more unbecoming than that in the course of Senators who indulge in such a line of conduct; and it is this: to endeavor to screen from investigation those in whom public confidence is sought to be sapped where they are delinquent. I lay it down as a principle of morals in politics, of duty, of patriotism and statesmanship, too, that where men high in office so act as to merit a forfeiture of public confidence, he who endeavors to disclose their shortcomings is in the highest line of the performance of his duty.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree with you, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I am gratified that the Senator does agree with me; and I trust he will show no further impatience when an investigation in relation to the maladministration of this Administration or any of its officers is proposed. Sir, the pure gold loses nothing by friction; it shines the brighter. Men who are conscious of an honest discharge of their duties to their country and to their Government never fear, but always court investigation.

Sir, I am sorry to have said what I have said on the present occasion. I have marked at various times the distaste, (but I care not for it,) the revulsion (but I care not for that) with which men sometimes listen to my remarks in condemnation of the powers that be. Sir, I have lived a life now of some years. It has not often been my fate to be in the majority; but occupying a position in the minority, being at one time a Representative in the House, now a member of the Senate, and above all an American freeman, whose liberties are guaranteed to him by the Constitution of my country, I dare do, and I intend to continue to dare to do my duty in the investigation of the maladministration of the Government. I commenced disciplining myself in the school of opposition when he of the Hermitage was President. Yes, sir, I have heard the lordly roar of the old lion of the Hermitage, and so have many men who were educated in that school of opposition, without quailing, and they who have listened to the roar of that monarch of the political forest, as it were, are not going to be frightened by the howl of jackals. [Laughter.]

Sir, I am earnest in the utterance of my opinions, because I conceive them strongly. I intend no discourtesy to any gentleman, and if I am convicted of any discourteous course towards any gentleman whatever, the highest pleasure and pride of my life would be to make him an atonement by a proper apology. I ask but the freedom of an American citizen to investigate the administration of my Government, the administration of Abraham Lincoln, as I investigated that of James Buchanan, and of Franklin Pierce, and of all the preceding Presidents; and that far I intend to claim and exercise the right.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Kentucky supposes that there is any disposition here to shrink from the investigation of any truth in relation to this Administration, or that there is any disposition to screen or to cover up the truth of any transaction in the administration of the Government, they are entirely mistaken. There is no such purpose. It has been most distinctly disavowed. All that I said was this: that unfounded and unnecessary attacks made upon the Administration by any member of this body, and especially when made upon the Navy Department by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, are things that I most deeply regret, for the reason that from the very source from which they come they have a tendency to destroy the confidence of the people in the administration of that Department, with which, if he is not, he ought to be, very closely associated. I repeat, sir, that the source from which this attack comes reminds me of the former attack upon the head of that Department in relation to the purchase of vessels in New York. Although, as the Senator says, he referred in that case to particulars, stated names, and gave dates, it was not to that to which I referred in my previous remarks, but to the general denunciations contained in that speech of his which we had repeated to the Senate yesterday, and which every friend of this Government and this Administration had to meet all over the country and to refute. I deplore such unnecessary and uncalled-for attacks from such a source. Let us have an opportunity of examining for a short time to see what this yellow-covered pamphlet contains before we are called upon to vote to raise a committee of investigation with power to send for persons and papers, and thus strike a blow at the confidence of the country in the Administration and in the Government. If there be any well-founded charges in it, I shall not shrink, nor shall I attempt to screen any officer of the Government, either in or out of the Senate.

The Senator from Kentucky says he has heard the lion of the Hermitage roar, and was not terrified. I do not think anything would terrify the Senator from Kentucky. I never doubted his courage. But he states another fact, and it is a pregnant fact, that he was schooled in opposition to the Government for twenty or thirty years of his life.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me a single word, he entirely mistakes me. I did not say that I was schooled in opposition to the Government. What I said was that I was schooled in opposition to the maladministration of the Government.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Schooled in opposition to the Administration of General Jackson. That may be so, and the Senator may have educated himself in the school of opposition, the first principle of which is to oppose everything and propose nothing, and from long education in such a school, he may have given way to a habit of thought which leads him to fault-finding and nothing else.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It becomes the duty of the Chair to interrupt the Senator. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I have but a few words more to say.

MR. POWELL. I move that the unfinished business be postponed.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I am willing to let the regular order of business come up, because then this resolution will go over until Monday, and that is what I want.

MR. JOHNSON and others. Go on now.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved that the pending business before the Senate, being the unfinished business of yesterday, be postponed until to-morrow.

MR. WILSON. Let it be postponed for a short time, liable to be called up when this matter is disposed of.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It can be postponed by the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

MR. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not stand here to say—

MR. DAVIS. As the Senator from Wisconsin has paused, with his courtesy I will make a remark which I intended to make before, but omitted to do, in relation to the remarks of the honorable Senator from California.

MR. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky will excuse me, I prefer to conclude my remarks, which will be very brief, rather than to have a speech, addressed to the Senator from California, interpolated in what I am about to say.

MR. DAVIS. Very well.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I was about to conclude my remarks with one or two observations. I do not undertake to say that there have been no mistakes and no frauds practiced upon the Administration of the Government during this war. Such a state of things as a perfect administration of Government never existed upon this earth since any Government began. Wherever there has been an expenditure of public moneys, there has always been more or less fraud in that expenditure. Where the carcass is, there the vultures gather. But, sir, if you compare the administration of this Government in the immense expenditures during the course of this war—an expenditure to which the Government was wholly unaccustomed, an expenditure to which the officers themselves were unaccustomed, sometimes not knowing even the necessary checks and guards to prevent fraudulent transactions in the expenditures—if you compare them with the expenditure of the public moneys in England, in France, and in Russia, in the Crimean war or in the Italian war, you will find that the percentage of money which may have been taken from the Treasury of the United States improperly, fraudulently, or wrongfully, is not as great by one half as it is in either of those countries. The amount of money which has been taken from the Treasury of the United States improperly during the expenditures of this war is not as great per cent. as it has been under every Administration of the Government from its foundation down to this very hour. Look at the Florida war; look at the Mexican war; look at the expenditures under every Administration of the Government, and you will find that upon the amount expended more percentage has been plundered from the Treasury during other Administrations than during this Administration.

I do not deny that these things will occur, and, of necessity, do occur. It is impossible to prevent some fraudulent contracts being made. There may not be any frauds committed by the officers of the Government in giving the contracts, but frauds are practiced upon the Government by combinations of bidders for these contracts. These contractors are a great and powerful body of men. They know how to circumvent the officers of the Government, and they sometimes succeed. Sir, you might just as well undertake to say that the dead and wounded may lie on the field of battle, and that the birds of prey, the vultures and carrion birds, will not come to that field, as to say that we can have these great expenditures of public money, and yet never have any fraudulent expenditures. You might just as well undertake to stop the war because you cannot drive off all the birds of prey from the fields of battle, to arrest the wheels of Government and undertake to stop the expenditure of public money because these thieves and plunderers will sometimes get their hands into the Treasury.

I am willing to go as far as the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Kentucky, or any other Senator on this floor, to expose and to punish fraudulent transactions and fraudulent expenditures, but at the same time as wise men, knowing the history of the world and the history of all public expenditures, we must accept as a fact, as an evil which of necessity comes with these expenditures, that some of them will be fraudulent in spite of all that we can do. And yet we must go on; we must continue these expenditures; we must sustain the Government; we must fight this war through; we cannot arrest it nor arrest ourselves in the discharge of our duties by spending the whole of our time in decrying these fraudulent expenditures when we should give our whole heart and energy and will and purpose to the prosecution of this war and to the putting down of the rebellion.

MR. PRESIDENT, I have said all and much more than I intended to say on this subject.

MR. HENDRICKS. Before the gentleman closes his argument, I wish to ask him one question. I do not intend to participate in the debate between him and the Senator from New Hampshire touching the question whether there shall be an investigation of the conduct of the Navy Department, but I understood the Senator to say that, in proportion to the amount expended, there were larger frauds during the Mexican war than during the present war. I desire to ask the Senator (inasmuch as of course he has investigated that subject before venturing to make a comparison so very severe) what amount of fraudulent expenditures he has found to have been made in the Mexican war, and to what cases he referred?

MR. DOOLITTLE. This whole debate has sprung up without any facts or papers being before us, except the yellow-covered pamphlet we find on our tables. I am not prepared at this moment to state the precise facts, but on some subsequent occasion I shall reply to the honorable Senator.

MR. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator, then, if he can say in his place that he knows that in any particular instance there was a fraud in the expenditure of the money for the prosecution of the war against Mexico?

MR. GRIMES. I am tolerably fresh from the reading of a book by General Ripley, who has been recently, if he is not at present, in command of the rebel forces at Charleston, called the History of the War with Mexico. The Senator from Indiana will remember that he was an adherent of his political party, and was an attaché of General Pillow's staff. That book therefore may be considered as Democratic authority on a subject of that kind. He was the principal witness against General Scott in the celebrated Pillow court-martial. If the Senator will refer to General Roswell W. Ripley's history, he will learn something of the frauds that were perpetrated in the quartermaster's department in the city of New Orleans during the Mexican war.

MR. HENDRICKS. The reference the Senator from Iowa has made in referring me to a book that has been published, but which it has not been my good fortune to read, does not meet the point I made to the Senator from Wisconsin. He has ventured the averment, and it is a very serious one, because the country does not doubt the enormity of the frauds perpetrated during this Administration, that the Administration was guilty of greater frauds, in proportion to the amount expended, during the Mexican war than during the present war, and I wish—

MR. DOOLITTLE. The gentleman will allow me to correct him entirely, if he is now stating what he understood me to say. I did not say that this Administration had been guilty of any fraud, nor that the Administration in the Mexican war had been guilty of any fraudulent expenditure of public money, but that moneys had been fraudulently obtained by contractors, and perhaps by collusion with some of the officers in some of the Departments. I do not mean the heads of Departments or the heads of bureaus; but through the assistance of officers in the Departments frauds may have been perpetrated, and were perpetrated—frauds by contractors upon the Government, in the quartermaster's department, the commissary department, and the various other departments. I did not charge that the Administration had fraudulently expended money, or that frauds came from the Administration; nor do I admit that this Administration has paid one dollar fraudulently in any case whatever; or that any head of any Department in this Government has been guilty of any such thing; nor do I admit it in any Department of the Government.

MR. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to discuss the question just suggested by the Senator, but I wish to know of him whether he makes this serious charge—for by making a comparison between any other Administration and this Administration he does make a serious charge against that other Administration. I wish to know of the Senator if he has investigated the subject so that he can say, of his own investigation, that the frauds perpetrated during the prosecution of the Mexican war equaled the frauds during this war, in proportion to the amount expended.

MR. DAVIS. I rise merely to say a word. I think the Senate are satisfied, from the point that was between the honorable Senator from New Hampshire and myself yesterday, that I made a legitimate use of his speech. However, whatever may be the judgment of other gentlemen in relation to that matter, it is my own judgment, and that is sufficient for me.

I omitted to make a single remark in relation to the definition of loyalty that was given by the honorable Senator from California. He spoke of loyalty, and of its being a very high phase of loyalty that every man should sustain all the officers of the Government in the due and just administration of their offices. I assent to the truth of that principle with as much heartiness as the Senator from California, or any other gentleman. I have endeavored to act upon it since I have been a member of this body, and I intend so to continue to act. I will support, according to my reason, every just and wise measure of this Administration to carry on the war to a speedy and successful close. I have done so, and I shall continue to do so. But there is a higher phase of loyalty than that which was so handsomely adverted to and stated with so much distinctness by the Senator from California, and it is this: where a Senator, where a private citizen, where any individual believes he discovers that the administration of the Government in any of its departments and especially in its executive department, is in conflict with the Constitution of the country and the liberties of the people, it is a higher phase of loyalty to oppose that aggression of the President and of his Administration upon the Constitution and the rights guaranteed to the freemen of the United States, than it is even to approve of his measures where they are right.

The gentleman gave his assent, while I was up before, to the position of free investigation that I claimed for myself. I make my acknowledgments to him for the frankness of that concession, and any remarks that I made that were harsh in their character, were intended to refer only to those men in the Senate, or out of the Senate, who attempted to restrict that perfect freedom of investigation and of debate, and therefore will not apply to the Senator.

MR. CONNESS. Mr. President, I did not feel that a remark made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis,] which sounded rather harsh and inappropriate here, applied to me at all. The Senator says that he did not intend it; and if he had intended it, I could not have felt that it applied to any Senator here. I believe the remark had reference to his description of his former glory and his present degradation, in having once heard the roar of the lion of the political forest, and now being compelled to listen to jackals. I think that was the figure.

MR. DAVIS. I accept the Senator's interpretation.

MR. CONNESS. I sympathize with and commiserate the Senator in his present position. To what base uses, sir, do we come at last! But, sir, all I have to say in this matter can be now said in a very few words. I say to the Senator from Kentucky, and to the Senator from New Hampshire, that it cannot be fairly deduced from any remarks made by me, that I would now shrink, or will ever shrink from any investigation, founded on facts, necessary to the illustration of the proper mode of conducting this, our Government, and I think it was rather disingenuous for a Senator to attribute that tone to either the remarks that I made, or those that fell from the Senator from Wisconsin.

But, sir, taking the case as stated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, namely, his great loyalty and advocacy and defense upon all occasions of constitutional liberty, (which is indeed a very high office,) what is the position of those gentlemen here who are associated with me more nearly politically? I take the case as stated by the Senator. Our defense is of the Administration, of those agents engaged in carrying on the Government to the legitimate extent to which that support should be given. While we confine ourselves to these respective spheres, I do not see but that the country will go on very quietly, the Senator from Kentucky defending constitutional liberty, we defending the proper administration of the Government. I think, sir, there is hope in the future.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, one word. The Senator from New Hampshire, in the course of his remarks, imputed to me the assertion, I believe, that I was authorized to speak as the representative of the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator to say that he spoke for himself and for the Navy Department.

Mr. GRIMES. What I did say, or intended to say—I think I used the language—was, that as a friend of the naval service, and as a friend of the Department, I felt authorized to say, but not as the representative of the Navy Department, that I believed the Navy Department would desire the most thorough investigation into any charges that any Senator here will rise in his place and assert that he believes to be true, or that he has reason to believe to be true. I desire now to say also that when any Senator shall desire an investigation into the transactions of that Department, or into the transactions of any other Department or bureau in this Government, he shall always have my vote in favor of his proposition, as the Senator from New Hampshire shall have my vote in favor of this; but I wish to submit to the candor of the Senator himself whether he thinks this resolution is drawn in exactly the phraseology that we ought to adopt. If the investigation is to be confined to the subject of these steam-engines, I have no objection, for that seems to be what the Senator predicates his case upon; but this resolution goes far beyond that, and I think is what might very properly be called a fishing resolution. It reads:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the present condition of the Navy, the efficiency of the steam-engines lately constructed and now being constructed for the use of the Navy, the mode and manner of procuring supplies for the Navy, and the condition of the Department generally; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

"The condition of the Department generally!" Is this committee to be authorized to go into an investigation as to the assignment of particular officers to particular ships, or whether one man has been detached improperly from one ship and added to another? The investigation under this resolution would be interminable, and the committee, if they undertook it, would never be able to reach any accurate conclusion, any conclusion that it would be safe for the members of this body to act upon. It would only create "confusion worse confounded." I trust, therefore, that the Senator will confine his resolution to some particular, specific inquiry. If he wants to take up the subject of supplies, if he alleges that frauds have been perpetrated upon the Government in furnishing supplies to any bureau in the Navy Department, I will go with him to instruct any committee, a select or a standing committee, to thoroughly overhaul that subject. If he wants to take up the subject of the construction of ships, I am willing to do that; but I do not think the Senate ought to adopt a resolution in such broad phraseology as this is couched in.

Mr. HALE. In regard to that suggestion, let me say that I have no choice, no preference; but I will state, as the Senator from Iowa has called it up, that there are one or two other matters upon which I think there ought to be investigation; and one of them is the matter of furnishing supplies. If I understand the Secretary aright, he proposes to abolish the present mode of furnishing them. I have seen—and I base this statement upon official documents which have come under my notice—a list of articles furnished by advertised proposals to the Navy Department, where the price varied from one hundred to ten hundred per cent. above the market price. For instance, an article costing twelve dollars has been furnished at $150. That I have seen in the official statements.

Mr. WILSON. Did the Government take it at that price?

Mr. HALE. The Government took it; the market price being twelve dollars, and the contract price $150. I will mention another article that I have seen in that same list. Cotton waste, the market price of which was twenty-nine cents, has been furnished by contract on advertised proposals at eighty cents. Things of that sort I have seen from the official records of the Department. Now, what I want to find out is whether that is one of the inevitable consequences growing out of the system itself, or whether there has been misconduct, and if so, where. I aver nothing upon this subject as to whose fault is, but the fact I do aver, for I have seen it.

Mr. CONNESS. With the Senator's consent I should like to ask him a single question.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. My question is, if, upon this state of things, the Senator has ever conferred with the head of the Department in regard to it, and sought any explanation from the Navy Department?

Mr. HALE. I have.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to have the answer which was given.

Mr. HALE. Well, sir, I will give the answer, as near as I can recollect it. The answer that I understood to be given was that they were obliged to take the lowest bid. That was the answer that was given to me. There may be a great many suggestions made in regard to how such things happen, which I intended to reach by this inquiry.

I will tell the Senator from Iowa another thing. There have been some statements made to me (I do not know whether they are facts or not) equally objectionable with this. Now, sir, in this I make no charge. It may be the inevitable consequence of our law that the Secretary is obliged to pay $150 for what he knows is worth but twelve dollars in open market.

Mr. ANTHONY. What are the articles?

Mr. HALE. Monkey-wrenches.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state in regard to the article of cotton waste, that I suppose there is no time when there is not a great difference between different qualities. If one quality would be worth twenty-nine cents, another would be worth eighty. At any time, one quality is worth five or six times as much as another.

Mr. HALE. I do not know anything about that; but these are facts which come to me, and I think they ought to be inquired into. I am not particular about the form of the resolution. I am willing that it shall be put in any form. I am willing that there shall be a special commission authorized by the President. I am willing that the inquiry shall be made in any way; and the last one I want is that it may be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Having said thus much, before I sit down, I move to amend the resolution so that, instead of the Naval Committee, a select committee shall make the inquiry.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, there is no question but that great frauds are perpetrated upon the Navy Department in the matter to which the Senator has alluded; but it is the fault of the Congress of the United States that they are perpetrated, and not of the Navy Department. If the Senator will refer to the tenth volume of the Laws of Congress, Little & Brown's edition, page 583, the act approved August 5, 1855, he will see that each one of these bureaus is compelled to procure supplies in classes. There is hardly any article known to any merchant transacting business in any portion of the country that is not at some time or other required in our navy-yards. They divide these different articles off, and classify them according to the description of the goods; in the article of iron, all the descriptions of iron they want; in the article of hardware, all of that description; paints, oils, and dyestuffs, everything of that description; groceries, everything of that description; and so on. Then they have various kinds of miscellaneous articles embodied together, and the frauds to which the Senator has alluded have been perpetrated in this miscellaneous class.

Having had my attention already called to this subject, privately, by the Senator from New Hampshire, I have before me the bids that were made by the different parties at the navy-yard here for the supply of the identical articles to which the Senator from New Hampshire has alluded. These bids were made, one by a man named J. L. Savage, another by Collins & Co., another by a man named H. D. Stover. It is true that Mr. Stover proposed to furnish monkey-wrenches for forty dollars a dozen, and Mr. Savage proposed to furnish them at $150 a dozen, while Collins & Co. proposed to furnish them at twenty dollars a dozen; and it is also true that Stover proposed to furnish cotton waste at sixty cents, while Savage proposed to furnish it at sixteen cents. But there were in this same class six hydraulic jacks asked for. Mr. Savage agreed to furnish them at $290 apiece, while Mr. Stover asked $465 apiece. When you come to add up these bids, which are made in classes in accordance with a law of Congress which I have sought in vain to have repealed, and which I think the Senator from New Hampshire did not vote with me in favor of repealing—[Mr. HALE shook his head.] Yes, sir; two years ago I sought to abolish this whole system under which naval supplies are furnished, and the Senator opposed my movements—I say, when you come to add up these bids it will be found that the lowest bidder is Mr. Savage, and the highest bidder is Mr. Stover, although on the two articles of monkey-wrenches and cotton waste Mr. Stover was the lowest bidder. Mr. Savage was the lowest on the aggregate, while Mr. Stover was the highest on the aggregate by some four hundred and odd dollars; yet on these particular items Stover was the lowest bidder.

If the Government had not carried into effect the law of Congress, and had refused to accept any of those bids, it would have been forced then to go into open market through your Navy agents—a species of nuisance that I have also attempted to abolish. Let me tell you what the law is in regard to that; for I intend, if my life is preserved, to again introduce a bill to abolish the whole system under which naval supplies are now furnished. The master mechanic at the navy-yard in the town of Charlestown, for instance, or any other yard, will report to the Navy Department that he will probably want so many articles of a particular character, and so many others of another character, and so on. He will have an understanding with a man who is about to bid for the contract, that he will really want ten times as many of certain articles as the Department is informed by him that he will want. The Department advertises that it will want the number certified by the master workman. Then the bidder who is in collusion with the master workman will put those particular items at a very high price in his bid. He is also informed by the same master workman that there are some other articles of which he will want but very few, but he recommends the Department here to advertise for a large number of them, representing that they will be wanted. The bidder proposes to furnish these articles to the Government at a very small price. When he comes to supply the Government with the articles for which he has obtained a contract, he supplies only a few of those articles that are put in at a very small price, and a great many of the articles that are put in at a very large price. If the Government refuse to accept the bid entirely, they are forced by the laws of Congress to go into the open market, and purchase through the Navy agents. You have another law which declares that if any Navy agent who goes into the market to make purchases shall produce a certificate of two respectable merchants that the article bought by him is purchased at the ordinary market price, his account for it shall be audited and allowed. I am told, though I shall not assert that it is so, that there have been certificates furnished in regard to the purchase of the single article of copper in one of the cities of this Republic, and by apparently responsible merchants, fixing a price three cents a pound more than it could have been bought for at any market on the continent, and yet under the laws of Congress, as they now stand, and which I have sought in vain to repeal, the Navy Department is compelled to pay the money.

If all that the Senator from New Hampshire desires is simply to unravel this question in connection with the purchases for the Navy Department, he need not send it to a select committee. The Naval Committee has been informed of it for the last three years, to my certain knowledge. I have been informed of it. I have known that it was going on. I called the attention of some of my friends to it here last year in a case that came up from the city of Boston, where parties asked for relief. My friend from Illinois will remember it. It was a case where parties proposed to furnish round iron at a quarter of a cent a pound, when it was worth at that time, in the market, four and a half cents a pound; yet they made up for that by charging eight cents a pound for iron that was not worth more than three cents and a half. The Government, by the law of Congress, is required to take the lowest bidder, the lowest aggregate bidder, according to the classes as they exist.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa what is the difficulty in advertising separately for articles of any considerable importance?

Mr. FOOT. It is against the law.

Mr. GRIMES. It is against the law, as my friend from Vermont suggests. As I said before, I intend, if my life be spared, to introduce a bill requiring that each particular article, I care not if it is only a single bunch of pins, shall be bid for separately and distinctly. It may impose more labor on the Navy Department; it may require another clerk or two at each one of our navy-yards; but I think it will, in the end, save an immense amount of money. I have had my attention called to that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of submitting a resolution of a personal nature. I find on my desk a series of resolutions introduced into the Senate on the 5th instant by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] Those resolutions class the Government and its supporters—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will first submit his resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Very well; I submit my resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, did on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions in which, among other things, it is declared that "the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands," thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States and those in authority who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union, and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States, and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Will the Senate give unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution at the present time?

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to call it up for action at the present time, but I intend to do so at some time hereafter, for I desire to record my vote upon it. I have offered this resolution, without consultation with any Senator, on my own responsibility. Often I heard the men who organized this treasonable rebellion threaten the dissolution of the Union, and make treasonable appeals to the country, and when this bloody revolution opened I resolved that if I ever heard in this Chamber more treasonable utterances, I would move the expulsion of the Senator uttering words of treason. These are not words uttered in debate, but they are in the Senator's resolutions. He tells the people, he asks the Senate to tell the people of the country, the loyal men of the North and the rebels of the South, to revolt; yes, sir, to revolt against their war leaders, to take affairs into their own hands, to elect delegates to a national convention, to stop the war. No proposition was ever made in the Senate of the United States, not even by the conspirators who organized this slaveholders' rebellion, more unconstitutional, seditious, and rebellious. If the people follow his advice, if they revolt against the President, Congress, the Supreme Court, the "war leaders," if they take the power into their own hands, if they go into national convention, a convention unknown to the Constitution and the laws, assume authority to close the war, and adjust the terms of peace in defiance of the Government of the United States, war, civil war, is inevitable, and the loyal States will be plunged into the fire and blood of internal strife. Stripped of its verbiage, the Senator's proposition means this, nothing less.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts presents a garbled version of my resolution. It does not embody my resolution so as to express its sense; and the inferences that that Senator draws from it are not authorized by its language or its spirit. Sir, what did that honorable Senator admit within the last two years? He admitted that when his own State was in a state of rebellion against the United States, he sympathized with that rebellion.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator did.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I interrogated that Senator and his colleague in relation to their course and sympathies in the Burns case that occurred in Boston some years ago. "The galled jade winces;" "my withers are unwrung." When the gentleman speaks of treason and disloyalty to his Government, he speaks from the recesses of his own heart, not mine.

He puts his own interpretation on the resolution that I offered. That resolution I abide by; but I deny that it authorizes the conclusion the Senator from Massachusetts is forcibly trying to deduce from it; far from it. It however strikes the Senator on this point: he is here an advocate for the interference of the military power at elections, to destroy their freedom, and to appoint to office by the bayonet instead of the free suffrages of the people. Now, my resolution—its purport, its meaning, its spirit—is, that the people shall rise at the polls and take the power of this Government and of this country, that properly belongs to them, there, at that constitutional forum, into their own hands, by peaceful convention; that the people North and the people South shall both do it, and repudiate their war leaders—leaders who desire a continuance of this terrible struggle, and who are opposed to its peaceful settlement. Sir, I give them that counsel in the resolution complained of; I give them that counsel here, everywhere. The thought of mutiny or disaffection in the Army was not in my mind. How is it with the Senator? If I recollect aright, he stated that his sympathies were with Burns in the Massachusetts insurrection.

Mr. WILSON. Never.

Mr. DAVIS. Were you against his rescue?

Mr. WILSON. I had nothing to do with it; and had no knowledge of it until after it transpired. I was not in my own State at the time.

Mr. DAVIS. Did you ever condemn that insurrection? Did you ever do anything to put it down—its spirit?

Mr. WILSON. There was no occasion; it was put down quickly.

Mr. DAVIS. Did you ever do or say anything to assert the authority of the laws and of the United States in that insurrection? Did you ever express any condemnation of it? No, sir; no.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if there is any subject before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no subject before the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts did not ask for the present consideration of his resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. I move, then, that the Senate do now adjourn. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. WILSON. Let us go on with the bill we had up yesterday.

Mr. HARLAN. As the Senator from Massachusetts expresses a desire to go on with his bill, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CLARK. Let the Senator from Kentucky go on.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Massachusetts having made an explanation of the reasons which induced him to offer the resolution, I think it is but proper and courteous, and according to the usage of the Senate, that the Senator from Kentucky, if he sees fit to reply to those remarks, should have the liberty of doing so. ["Certainly."]

Mr. WILSON. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. HARLAN. If we are not to proceed with the legitimate business of the Senate, and the time of the body is to be consumed in personal wrangling, I shall feel it to be my duty to renew the motion to adjourn; and I therefore do so. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better first settle the question whether we shall meet to-morrow.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether the motion to adjourn meets his approbation; because if it does not I hold that the Senator from Iowa has no right to make the motion, the Senator from Kentucky being on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky was out of order and lost the floor. The motion of the Senator from Iowa is in order.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. FOSTER. Previous to that motion I wish to move, with the consent of the Senate, that when we adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will entertain that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the bill which was under consideration yesterday.

Several SENATORS. Let the Senator from Kentucky go on.

Mr. DAVIS. I had said about all that I desired to say at this point of time, and that was simply to state that the Senator's interpretation of my resolution was against the terms and the spirit of the resolution, and false in fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, the pending question being upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to add as an additional section:

And he it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as authorizes the discharge of persons drafted into the service of the United States under the authority of that act upon the payment of a sum of money not exceeding $300, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the enacting clause of the proposed section, and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

That no drafted person shall be allowed to furnish a substitute, but he shall be discharged from the draft on paying to such officer as the Secretary of War may authorize to receive the same the full sum of $300: And provided further, That every such person thus discharged shall pay, in addition to the said sum of $300, a certain proportion in the nature of a title of his annual gains, profits, or income, whether derived from any kind of property, dividends, salary, or from any profession, trade, or employment, whatever, according to the following rates, to wit: on all income over $500, and not over $2,000, ten per cent.; over $2,000, and not over $5,000, twenty per cent.; and on all income over $5,000, thirty per cent.; and it shall be the duty of every such person seeking to be discharged to make return, either by himself or his guardian, to the provost marshal of his district of the amount of his income, according to the requirements of the act to provide internal revenue of July 1, 1862; and so much of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, as is inconsistent with this section, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I have been very much gratified, in the discussion of this bill, to find a disposition on all sides to treat the questions absolutely with reference to their merits, with a single desire of perfecting the bill. There seems to have been no opposition from any quarter merely on party grounds. All that gives assurance that Senators will now give sincere attention to the proposition which is made absolutely and simply with that purpose. I presume that I do not exaggerate if I say that of all the questions connected with this bill that relating to commutation money for service is the most difficult and the most sensitive. It is the question which I presume has most occupied the attention of the country. It has been most discussed in the newspapers, and also in conversation. I presume it is the ground of objection which has been most often made against the draft.

Now I think all Senators will unite in any proposition which promises in any way to smooth those difficulties; in short, to popularize a part of the bill which all Senators know has been open to much popular objection.

The proposition which I make has in it three elements. It proposes in the first place that no person shall be allowed to furnish a substitute, but the whole shall be done by the Government. I believe there has been occasionally much abuse from the fact that the Government has not taken that matter into its own hands, that it has been open to speculation from the action and counteraction of persons interested. The proposition in the second place proposes that the commutation of $300 shall be fixed by law, so as not to vary in the discretion of the Secretary of War. Senators are aware that, by the law as it now stands, the commutation of $300 may be varied. Three hundred dollars is the maximum, but the Secretary may fix any sum under that. In the third place, my proposition declares that every drafted person shall pay $300; and if he have an income above $600, then ratably according to his income. I will read the proposition as it is:

"And provided further, That every such person thus discharged shall pay, in addition to the said sum of $300, a certain proportion in the nature of a title of his annual gains, profits, or income, whether derived from any kind of property, dividends, salary, or from any profession, trade, or employment, whatever, according to the following rates, to wit: on all income over $600, and not over $2,000, ten per cent.; over $2,000, and not over $5,000, twenty per cent.; and on all income over $5,000, thirty per cent.; and it shall be the duty of every such person seeking to be discharged to make return, either by himself or his guardian, to the provost marshal of his district of the amount of his income, according to the requirements of the act to provide internal revenue of July 1, 1862; and so much of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, as is inconsistent with this section, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Much of the language of this proviso is borrowed from the internal tax bill. The phraseology of it I have taken bodily from that bill. Now, Mr. President, though this proposition, as I have said, contains three different elements; first, that no person shall be allowed to furnish a substitute; secondly, fixing the minimum commutation absolutely at $300; and, thirdly, adding to that commutation money of $300 a ratable sum according to the income of the person drafted, yet the single object of the whole proposition is to establish a ratable contribution according to income, which every drafted man shall pay. That is not only the central idea of the proposition, but it is the single object of the proposition, to which all the other parts of it are subordinate.

It will be observed that it will be practically impossible to require this ratable contribution, unless you declare that no person shall be allowed to furnish a substitute, and there will also be a practical difficulty in the way of it if you do not fix the standing sum at $300, not leaving it to be varied in the discretion of the Secretary. I have, therefore, in preparing this proposition, introduced these two other elements as simply subordinate to the main proposition, the object being, in one word, to equalize the burden of this commutation where a person is drafted, that it may at least seem to be more equal even if it be not really more equal, and that, in one word, it may be popularized to the country.

Some persons have said to me that I proposed to require a very large sum from certain persons who may be drafted, but I ask Senators whether any sum which is reasonable can be too large for a man of wealth to contribute if he should be drafted. Take, for instance, a man who has an income of $5,000, or of $10,000 if you will, what is the commutation money of $300 to him? It is nothing. What is an additional sum of ten per cent., or twenty per cent., on that income? I say again, it is absolutely nothing as a commutation for the service which the country has a right to expect from him. He escapes from the hazard of wounds, of disease, and of death, and he also secures to himself the full employment of his time during the period of one, two, or three years for which he may be drafted. Is there anything that he can reasonably pay which can be considered as too much?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I gave a good deal of attention to this provision of the original bill when it was adopted. I came somewhat reluctantly into the support of it, though I drafted the original section; but I must say that subsequent reflection has satisfied me of the wisdom of the provision. I think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts goes upon a wrong theory. The Government asked for men, and we passed the enrollment law, and we inserted the commutation clause to relieve some people and enable them to get substitutes; but the idea was that the men should be furnished to the Government; that a man should either go himself or furnish a substitute, or give the Government money enough to obtain a substitute for him. The Senator's amendment strikes at all idea of a man's getting a substitute for himself, and puts it entirely into the hands of the Government. The idea of the bill was that the man should pay, not a percentage of his income, be he rich or be he poor, but should pay the Government enough to get a substitute, not exceeding $300. The bill declares that the money is to be applied for the purpose of getting a substitute. If the Senator's amendment be adopted, you take from every individual the chance of getting a substitute for himself and leave it entirely for the Government.

The operation of the bill in my section of the country was that a great many men who were drafted felt an inclination to go, or to furnish somebody for the service where they could not well go themselves. They said, "We will not pay this $300; we do not want to shirk it; it is not the money we care for; but we will put something else to the $300, and get a substitute, and put him into the Army for us, so that the Government shall have a man." The result was, in my State, that we furnished more men under the draft than any other State in the Union; we furnished fifty per cent. of the call. Towns came forward patriotically, and they said by their votes to the young men, "We want you to go into the service of the United States; and if you will go yourselves, or if you will furnish a substitute, we will give you $300 to help you get a substitute, or support your family; and you may add as much more to it as is necessary to procure a substitute." The effect of it was very beneficial; we got a great many men. Men that might otherwise have been exempted, chose to get substitutes, and put them into the Army of the United States.

Now, the Senator desires to popularize this measure. Is he certain that this will do it? I know that when the bill was passed it was assailed by the enemies of the Government, and was assailed by the enemies of the Administration. They said to us, "You take the rich man's money and the poor man's blood; the rich man can pay his commutation, the poor man cannot pay it; the rich man can be exempted, but the poor man cannot be exempted under that provision;" but I never failed, when I appealed to the people on that subject, to satisfy the people that the provision was for the benefit of the poor man. If there were no such provision, or if you now strike it out of the law, at what price is the poor man to get his substitute? It may be $1,000, it may be $2,000, it may be any price that a man chooses to ask if the drafted man's necessities are so great that he must take him. It may be entirely beyond the means of the poor man, but the rich man who has dollars at his command can command a substitute.

Then you do take the poor man's service and the rich man's money. But now there is scarcely any man in all the country so poor that by the aid of his town, by the aid of his friends, he cannot command $300 for a substitute, and if he cannot get a substitute for that sum, he pays it to the Secretary of War, who undertakes to get a substitute for him. You need never have any fear of appealing to the people on a provision so humane as that. It is for their benefit.

But, sir, where will you stand if you now repeal this provision of the law? When the law was passed, the enemies of the Government, as I have said, assailed it; they said everything harsh about it that could be said; and so great was the excitement in my State—we had an election coming off on the 6th or 7th of March after its passage—that the Democratic candidate for Governor appealed to his political friends that if they resisted this exorbitant draft, this outrageous measure, they might come to him, and he would defend them. But, nevertheless, we made our appeal to the people, and, though this law had not been passed more than four or five days, the friends of the Administration were triumphant. The draft was carried forward in my State, and we furnished more men than any other State in the Union, and it has come to commend itself to the people for its wisdom and kindness of feeling to the poor man.

Now, sir, suppose you repeal it, what will your enemies say? Why, exactly this: "What we have said about the draft was true, and you know it, and you have repealed it." But what will the friends of the Government say? Why this: "Our enemies said that that draft was for the benefit of the rich man and not the poor man; you told us it was for the benefit of the poor man, to keep the price of substitutes down; did you tell us truly?" "Certainly we did." "Then how came you to repeal it? Either one of two things follows—you did not tell us truly, or you have done now what is against our interest." In my judgment, sir, the provision had better be retained.

I know it is said by the Senator from Indiana that the Government wants men, and he feels that this provision does not furnish the men. It does not furnish a full supply of men, but I want to appeal to that Senator if he can adopt any other provision that will give the men and at the same time be so satisfactory to the people as this is. The draft is a hard measure—it will be a hard measure. War is a hard measure. It upturns and demoralizes everything. We have got to submit to hardships; but I submit to the Senator whether, having adopted this once and having had one draft under it, we had not better retain it than create any disturbance by repealing it. My own impression is that we had better retain it. Soldiers are volunteering; and we shall get the Army pretty well filled up by volunteers. If we are then obliged to resort to a draft, let those men go who can, let those furnish substitutes who can, and let those who cannot go or do not choose to go furnish their money. If you have not got the amount high enough, make it higher, and make the Government take that money and bring soldiers into the field with it. Under the operation of the old draft, if the twelve millions or more of money which was secured by the commutation clause had been well applied—and I do not say it has not been well applied—but if it had been entirely applied, I am not certain that we might not have got as many soldiers, and as good soldiers—I mean as much effectual military service out of it—as in any other way, especially if they had gone on and drafted for more men, as they might have done.

A sort of impression has gone abroad that you cannot enforce the draft. I know that people have different views about it, but I have no doubt and no hesitation in saying that you can enforce the draft. The people are desirous of seeing it enforced in many quarters. Your volunteer service furnishes willing men, but where does your volunteer service fall? Upon the earnest supporters of the Government, men in both parties, but upon the earnest supporters of the Government. Why should it not fall upon the others as well? I agree entirely with what the Senator from Maine so well said the other day, that every man owes his service to the Government. He owes his personal service to the Government, if he can be of use and the Government requires him, and I want to see the draft fall upon some places where they do not choose to support the Government. If they will not go let them pay, and let us get men that will fight for them. That you cannot do under any volunteer service. I say let us have both. I am neither in favor entirely of the volunteer service, nor entirely in favor of the draft. Let us have both. Let those who will, volunteer, and if we want more men, let the rest of the community be made to come up and render their service.

But there are a great many cases of hardship; men may be drafted who cannot go. It may not be entirely easy to find a substitute. There should be some measure provided for that. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] at the last session told us of some very hard cases in his own State, and I think they had effect in inducing the Senate to adopt this provision. There will always be such cases, and we ought to retain this clause, in my judgment, for that very purpose, in order to show to the country that while men shall go into the service, and while we enforce the draft time after time, until we get men enough, we will provide for those cases, and let off those whose circumstances are such that they cannot go. I am against the provision of the Senator from Massachusetts, because it uproots entirely the system of substitutes. I am against it in another view: that a man pays his tax on his income under the revenue act; he is once assessed there. He is now called for his personal service. That is what the Government wants. If he cannot give his personal service, let him get somebody to act for him, not compel him to pay two taxes, according to his income. I do not believe—I do not undertake to say, of course—that we can do better than to retain this provision of the bill of last year.

Mr. POMEROY. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the first provision of his amendment seems to conflict with the spirit of the amendment itself. That provision is, "that no drafted person shall be allowed to furnish a substitute." That seems to me to be in conflict not only with the law we have always had, but with the very spirit of the amendment itself. As this is an amendment to an amendment, I cannot move an amendment to it; but I wish to suggest that, although I think there is something popular in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, this first clause, that a drafted person shall not be allowed to furnish a substitute, must be very unpopular. If the Senator will accept a suggestion from me, I think it would be popular to say that every drafted person shall be allowed either to furnish a substitute or to pay the money.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it is against the spirit in which we are prosecuting this war, to enact into a law that a man shall not furnish a substitute. Some patriotic men whom I know of being drafted, and feeling that they wanted to serve the country, but knowing that there were others in the community who could do so vastly better than themselves, have paid as much as $1,000 for the sake of having a man to stand in their place who could do better than they could. I would not enact into a law a provision that a man shall not furnish a substitute.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will pardon me, I will suggest that I have drawn an amendment by which a man, whatever his age, whether liable or not, may be allowed first to volunteer, have that pride, and then put in a substitute.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not know what the Senator might have prepared; I was only speaking of what we have got before us. I think it will do very well to say that a man may either furnish a substitute or pay $300, and then it will be popular to say that if he has wealth he may pay even more than $300 by an assessment upon his income. The fact which the Senator from New Hampshire suggests, that a man is once taxed three per cent. on his income, does not alter the case. Who ever gets off with one tax in the year? If we do not have to pay five in a year, I think we may consider ourselves fortunate. It is no hardship to a man who has an income of $25,000 to pay $300. That is no tax to him; but if he first pays the $300, provided he does not choose to get a substitute, and then pays ten per cent. on his income in addition to his regular tax of three per cent., and in addition to all the other taxes, I think the measure will be popular in some quarters at least. I do not say that that would be altogether right; I would not advocate that as a measure of justice; but if our object is simply to popularize this thing, I would say, let every man drafted either furnish a substitute or pay $300, or more if he is able to pay more. I have no objection, of course, to his volunteering. He has that right without any law. You need not pass any law that a man may volunteer.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kansas for the suggestion that he has made. I stated, in the few remarks which I made in presenting this question, that I had introduced that first proposition because it seemed to me perhaps important to the completeness of the whole proposition; but I certainly have no particular attachment to the first proposition. I said that I regarded it as simply subordinate to the main idea. My desire is to ingraft upon the bill the idea that the rich man, if drafted, shall pay more than the poor man. That is all that I want to carry in connection with this amendment. All the rest I regard as subordinate, and therefore I gladly adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, supported, as it has been, by the suggestions of many Senators about me. I will therefore modify my proposition by striking out, in the first and second lines, the words, "no drafted person shall be allowed to furnish a substitute," and using the words, "every drafted person." It will then read, "that every drafted person shall be discharged from the draft on paying," &c. That, then, will leave the provision with reference to furnishing a substitute to stand on the existing law, or the other provisions of this statute.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator to something practical in relation to his amendment. The law as it now stands is, that a drafted man may furnish a substitute, or pay a certain sum, not exceeding $300, "for the procurement of such substitute." When the money is paid in, as it is said it was under the last draft to the amount of about twelve million dollars, the power of the Executive, of the Government, to use that money in procuring men to take the place of those drafted, is all contained in the words I have mentioned. We have no other law for it. The Government have offered to pay $300 for men who enlist for three years. They have done it without any other law than the one I have mentioned. They had in their hands the amount of about twelve million dollars, which had been paid in for the procurement of substitutes. Of course it was their right and it was their duty to use the money for that purpose.

This proposed amendment repeals all the law inconsistent with the section now offered; and this proposition is, that every man who is drafted may be discharged upon procuring a substitute, or paying the money as provided in this section. It does not say that when he has paid the money it shall be for procuring a substitute for him. It therefore will not be money in the hands of the Department which they would be authorized to use in procuring people in place of the men who have paid it in. The existing law does provide that the money shall be used for the procurement of substitutes; this does not.

Mr. SUMNER. This would fall under the general provision of the statute, I take it.

Mr. COLLAMER. But you repeal that part of the law by this. This supersedes altogether that portion of the existing law in relation to furnishing money to procure substitutes. You say the man shall be discharged if he will pay so much money; but what for?

Mr. SUMNER. He pays the money to an officer designated by the Secretary of War. Those are the very words of the old statute.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes; but the words of the old statute also were that the money should be paid in for the procurement of substitutes.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the designation is the same. I had that statute before me when I drew the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was the great point in the case, "for the procurement of such substitute." I think those are the very words.

Mr. SUMNER. I see now that the Senator is right.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not intend, in calling attention to this matter, to say anything about the merits of the amendment, because, perhaps, the Senator may amend it, but I wish to make some remarks about the $300 clause.

I will say in the first place that I understood, and I believe it was very generally understood in the Senate, that the great object of putting in that limitation for commutation was for the benefit of men of moderate circumstances, to enable them if they pleased to pay a sum of money for which we believed substitutes might be procured. Further, it was with a view to fix a limit to the price of substitutes in the market, that it should not go above that, because if the Government would take $300 to procure substitutes with, nobody would give any more in the market, and the Government could give no more, but would get them for that. That was the object.

Now it is suggested that that provision has in some measure defeated or prevented our obtaining by the draft the number of men which it has been expected would be obtained. I do not think so. It is true the draft did not result in bringing into the field so many effective men as had been hoped for, but it is not attributable to this cause. Let me state some of the causes to which it is attributable.

In the first place, somebody made out a schedule of infirmities for which a man was to be excluded as being an infirm man, not of sufficient physical ability. On reading it over it looked to me as if some one had undertaken to show what he knew of the most recent medical learning, by finding out all the probable infirmities to which the human frame could be subject, and especially all the most modernly invented diseases, or at any rate those for which new names had been invented. In short, very few men were to be found who could escape falling within some one or other of the various calls for infirmities, unless indeed it might be the man who could not find anything else, and said at last that he was very much subject to measles and wanted to be excused. [Laughter.]

An unexpectedly large number were excused under that. In the next place, it was found that a very large proportion of our able-bodied young men were dependent on their parents for support; [laughter;] and, what was worse than that, it was ascertained that the parents were dependent upon them. [Laughter.] Nobody had ever found it out before particularly; but there was a large part of these poor dependent young men dependent on their parents for support, and they showed somehow or other that their parents were dependent on them for support. That was worse yet. This was a very unexpected condition of things, and very large numbers got off on that plea. Between the infirmities of body and the infirmities of parents and children and their relative dependent condition, which came within the act, the number who were obtained under the act was comparatively few.

There was one other thing, however. Among the various decisions about the effect of the $300 clause, it was holden at one time—at least it was so understood in my part of the country—that if a man was examined and found to be physically able, he could not after that pay the money or furnish a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was that decision made in your State?

Mr. COLLAMER. It was said to be a decision made here by the head of the Department, and it stood for some time.

Mr. WILSON. It was corrected very soon.

Mr. COLLAMER. There was such a decision; but I know common sense finally prevailed and it was reversed. In the next place, somehow or other it was given out that the paying of the $300 was not to have precisely the same effect as the furnishing of a substitute. When the statute said that if a man furnished a substitute, or paid a sum of money for the procurement of a substitute, he should be released, I am sure I cannot conceive what is the difference. One man procures his substitute, another pays the money to procure a substitute, and the Government takes it for that purpose. Does he not procure a substitute through the instrumentality of the Government with his money precisely as was stipulated?

But again, how on earth could we get along with any notion of that kind? The Government took the money which the men paid in for commutation, and immediately employed other men with it. That was right; it was what they should do; it was what they had the money for. Now suppose I am drafted to-day, and I pay down my $300; my brother CLARK is drafted at the same time, and he pays it; my brother FESSENDEN is drafted, and he pays it. The Government take our money, and they hire substitutes; that is, they hire men for $300. They have hired one man. He is somebody's substitute—is he not? If he is not anybody's substitute, they had no right to hire him, for they had no right to use the money for any other purpose. Whose substitute is he? Evidently he is the substitute of any man who has paid $300. And yet the idea was that the Government could take the money for procuring substitutes, actually procure them, and then put in the man and draft him again.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do they hold that doctrine now?

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir, not exactly, but it has never been formally reversed. It has now been published by the Provost Marshal General that by order of the President it is held that the payment of the $300 has the same effect as the furnishing of a substitute, but that has been recently. While it was standing out as being in some measure a different thing, what was the effect? I do not say but that the gentlemen who gave that construction meant in suggesting to the people "your paying $300 will not have the same effect as getting a substitute," to encourage the getting of substitutes. Possibly it might have been intended for that; but the effect of it was that wherever people labored under the impression that it might not be the same thing, instead of paying the $300 they took that money and added more to it and went into the market and procured substitutes, and furnished them. The effect of that was that the price of substitutes in the market was driven above the $300. That measure of the Government has defeated the very policy of the law. The policy of allowing the commutation money was that the price of substitutes should not run above that, because nobody need give more than the Government. But because the people were told that if they paid the money it might not have the same effect as furnishing substitutes directly, they went into the market, gave higher prices for substitutes, and ran them above the amount intended to be limited by the bill, and then the Government could not get substitutes for $300, and it had to pay that money in addition to the bounty for an enlisted man, making $400.

I think the mode of administering the law tended very much to produce the effect that you did not get men readily with the $300 which persons were permitted to pay in. If the people had been told plainly and directly in the beginning that paying the money or furnishing substitutes would be the same in effect, they would not have given any more, and the Government would not have given any more than $300 for a substitute.

Such, Mr. President, was the manner of the execution of this law, and I cannot but further say that I do not see why the law, even as it resulted in the draft, was any failure at all. What was the amount of the draft? They proposed to draft about one fifth of those enrolled. The Senator from Indiana the other day gave us the numbers as they were returned. I do not remember the exact numbers; but that is not material. The general result is that leaving out of view the exemptions, of which I have already spoken, the Government got some twelve million dollars commutation money, and between forty and fifty thousand men. Why did they not go on, then, and draft another one fifth, get forty thousand men more and $12,000,000 more; and in the mean time why did they not use the $12,000,000 which they had got from persons who paid the $300 each, for the purpose of procuring substitutes? Why did they not go on in this way? If it had been done, would it not have been effective? If it had been as effective as the first draft, the result would have been to bring all the men we wanted, and we should not have to go through the whole five drafts to obtain the number of men desired.

Such being my view of the case, I do not see how gentlemen can say justly and truly that this draft law is a failure, and that the experiment made under it shows it to be such. It did not show any such thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will also remark that the draft was only enforced in some of the States, not in all.

Mr. WILSON. In twelve or thirteen.

Mr. COLLAMER. I thank the Senator from Ohio for calling my attention to that matter. If the draft had been made and pursued in all the States, I think it would have been effective. I think the experiment, so far as it has gone, speaks loudly in praise of the men who formed and framed that bill; and I cannot but think that to those of us who approved it and voted for it, the result of the draft shows the wisdom and efficiency of it if it had been executed.

Such being my views, I have but a word more to say about the $300 clause. It has been said by some gentlemen, I observe it has been said by the Senator from Indiana, that there are some people who wanted to pay the $300 and could not pay it. Well now, Mr. President, seriously and really, suppose that $300 provision had not been in that law, and a poor man had been drafted, would it have helped him any? He had to go, the Senator says; he could not get the $300. Would he not have had to go if there had not been any $300 clause in the law? Certainly. Then how did it hurt him? It did not hurt him at all.

But it is suggested that it let off a neighbor who did pay the money. Indeed! Well, that is so ordered in the direction of divine Providence. It is said that man should eat his bread in the sweat of his face, but there are a great many men among us who own their farms, and never sweat their faces at all. They hire their labor. Wealthy men will do so. That is the ordering of divine Providence; and because one man has to sweat at the face to cultivate the land, while his neighbor by his side does not, I do not see that the first has any ground to be worried about it.

But I ask you, how are you going to get relief from it in the way that is talked of? I do not mean the particular way now before us for consideration—but suppose you repeal the $300 clause. Why do you repeal it? Because a good many people cannot get the advantage of it, and they feel aggrieved at it. What is the effect of repealing it? In that event, we all agree that the price of substitutes would be a thousand or two thousand dollars. Then there would be a great deal larger number who could not get off, because they could not pay $2,000. Then you would add to the number of aggrieved people by multiplying it three or four score by repealing the clause. I do not see how by any possibility anybody could be relieved by that.

In short, sir, without occupying further time, I was content with that provision of the law as it stood; and I am content to permit it to stand. My own immediate neighborhood, perhaps, has no personal interest in it. I am informed that the State of Vermont has already filled her quota under the last call of the President, and about two hundred and seventy men over, without counting two whole regiments in the field which have re-enlisted. Though I have, therefore, no personal interest in it, I desire still that the clause should stand, because it is right. I do not shrink from repealing it because of the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire—though I think his suggestion is well founded—that by repealing it we acknowledge that we were wrong in inserting it. If we were wrong, I am willing to own it; but I must wait until I am convinced that it is wrong. I am not so convinced.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The argument of the Senator from New Hampshire does not strike me at all that because I voted to strike out this provision, I should vote to insert it again. Now, what is our present legislation upon the subject? It is just this: that the able-bodied persons who are deemed subject to draft by the board of enrollment shall either give personal service, hire themselves a substitute, or pay $300 commutation in lieu of a substitute. By the provision of the bill reported by the Military Committee, that $300 commutation exemption is proposed to be stricken out. Now, what is the effect of that $300 exemption in view of the present legislation upon the subject? Under the provisions of that bill, thirty-five thousand men paid their commutation money, and received a certificate of entire exemption for three years; and the conscription law was enforced in but a small portion of the States. If it had been enforced in all the States, instead of thirty-five thousand men who have today in their pockets certificates of exemption for three years, we should have had seventy-five or one hundred thousand men who would have been exempted under the operations of that law from any draft for three years. That is the effect of it. If thirty-five thousand are now exempted and exempt for three years on the payment of $300, if you enforce the conscription in all the loyal States, at each return of the draft one hundred thousand men may procure their exemption for three years. The report of the Provost Marshal General will show that we have less than half a million of men to draw from. Then, if we have continual drafts, and exempt at the end of every draft one hundred thousand men for three years, how long will you have any basis to draw from? You exempt these men for three years upon the payment of $300. That is one of the effects of this system.

Another is that under the conscription law the Secretary of War was authorized to pay the money obtained under the $300 clause in procuring substitutes. That was the provision of the law. He held that if the $300 commutation was paid, he had a right to issue a certificate to the man of exemption for three years. Whether it be the law or not, it was the order of the Secretary of War upon which we have operated from that day to this, and which we now propose to render effectual by appropriating $20,000,000 to cover the very bounties he has given under the provision of that law. That, I suppose, was the proper construction of the law, that a man might pay his $300 and get a certificate of exemption for three years. If the war is to be prolonged, I show you that at the end of two or three drafts you will have no one that has not an exemption certificate in his pocket, and you annihilate the Army; and if the war is prolonged, whatever is the result of this vote to-day, I tell you with perfect and entire confidence that in less than six months you will have to repeal the $300 exemption clause or you will have no Army in the field, because, instead of mending the matter, every time you repeat the draft you but exempt more and more men and leave less and less basis to draw your armies from.

Gentlemen tell you that the conscription law was ineffectual because it was not promptly enforced, and because the dose was not repeated until it had the desired effect. You tried the draft in four or five States, you exempted thirty-five thousand men, gave them a certificate of exemption for three years, and if you had tried it in all the loyal States the number exempted would have been much more, and at every returning draft as long as you retain the $300 clause you will have to exempt in the same proportion. Then where will you get your army from? Do you propose now, in the face of the emergencies under which the country labors, that after July next you shall have no armies in the field?

Gentlemen say, only repeat the draft and the effect must follow. Only repeat the draft and exempt thirty-five thousand men every time, and how long will it be till you get to the end? You must look to this thing squarely. It does seem to me in any view of the case that the $300 exemption clause should be repealed, and if the war goes on the substitute clause will be repealed also, and every able-bodied man owing allegiance to the Government, and a duty to defend the Government, will have to go in person to fight the battles of the country. You will not only repeal the $300 exemption clause in less than six months, but you will also repeal the right to obtain substitutes, if the war shall continue.

How does our legislation now proposed correspond with the present order of the War Department, which you propose to sanction by a vote of the Senate, paying $20,000,000 to cover these additional bounties? Just this, no more and no less: the Government offers $300 bounty to every raw recruit, if he will enter the Army, and at the same time tells him that if he pay $300 he need not enter the Army at all. The Government offers to every veteran soldier $400 bounty, and at the same time says that if subject to draft he may release himself on the payment of $300. That is, upon one hand you propose to give $400 bounty, and in the other case you say the man shall buy himself off, an exemption for three years, by the payment of $300. What sense is there, what practical common sense is there in offering $400 bounty to a man to enter the Army, and at the same time telling him he may buy his exemption for $300, $100 less?

Another injurious effect of the $300 exemption clause, it seems to me, is this: it did discourage volunteering—I speak in reference to my own State alone, and not in reference to others. While the citizen knew that he might exempt himself by the payment of $300, and run no risk of a draft, he was unwilling to volunteer. The moment you strike off the $300 exemption, then he has to take his choice between volunteering and the high bounty or the risk of being drafted into the service of the country; and so all those who are engaged in recruiting in our State with whom I have had correspondence, three or four colonels commanding new regiments, tell me that if you will strike off the $300 exemption clause they will fill their regiments immediately, but as long as that clause remains in the law men will not volunteer, because the draft has no terror to them; they can buy themselves off for $300.

I never indulged in this argument that this feature of the conscription law was class legislation of the rich against the poor; I never believed it; but so it was used, and so it was represented, and so I supposed it would be, and hence I opposed it. But I think the $300 exemption clause has resulted in evil and nothing but evil; and if you intend to maintain your armies in their present efficient condition, you are bound to repeal that clause to-day, or in a few weeks hence—because it is only a question of time—it will be seen that with that exemption your draft is ineffectual, and must necessarily be ineffectual. I might claim for my State what the distinguished Senator from Vermont claimed for his. My State does not dread the draft, and will fill her quota, perhaps, without it. We are willing to fill it, either under the draft or without it. Hitherto they have filled it by volunteering, and I prefer that mode. Give high bounties for volunteering, and if you have a draft at all, do not go into the mockery of a draft, and at the same time tell the citizen he may buy his peace for $300.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, although my committee instructed me to report the amendment, I am opposed to the repeal of the $300 commutation clause. I know that it was put into the act by Congress for the benefit of the people of the country, to make that law bear as lightly as possible upon the poor, toiling people. It has been demonstrated by experience so to operate. Nobody questions that now. Nobody rises in Congress now and denounces that provision as a discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich. I believe that the people of the country, by an uncounted majority, are against striking out that provision of the law. That is my conviction; and I believe we ought not at this time to do it. I do not see any necessity for doing it. We have enrolled a large number of men in the country. We shall not draft all those men. A large number of the States will furnish volunteers; some will not. I think we shall have a draft; but I do not believe it will be necessary to continue drafting. We have in the service of the country, and are paying in our Army, I think not less than six hundred and fifty or seven hundred thousand men. We must have from four to five hundred thousand effective soldiers in the field. I do not believe that the rebellion has over two hundred and twenty-five thousand men in arms; and I have very good reason so to believe. I believe that if we do our duty the military power of this rebellion will be crushed out before the 1st of October next.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The subject of the number of veteran soldiers going out of the service in the spring is so greatly misunderstood that, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will ask him what number of veterans go out of the service between now and the 1st of July.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot tell the number of men who will be discharged between now and the 1st of July. There cannot be, between now and the 1st day of July next, fifteen thousand of them.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That is my understanding.

Mr. WILSON. During the present year perhaps one hundred thousand veteran soldiers will go out of the service. The Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] who, perhaps, is too modest to say it publicly, tells me that nineteen regiments under one major general from the State of Iowa have reenlisted. Many other regiments have reenlisted.

A large portion of these old veterans seem resolved that they are in for the war, and intend to fight it out.

Mr. GRIMES. I ought to correct the statement the Senator has made. I said a brigadier general from the State of Iowa. My State does not furnish major generals.

Mr. WILSON. You have General Curtis, one of the oldest major generals in the service.

Mr. GRIMES. I received a letter from him the night before last stating that the second and seventh Iowa regiments, two crack regiments from my State, had enlisted bodily, and had gone home; and he says the remaining number, seventeen, under his command, are all in the process of going home, having almost unanimously reenlisted into the service.

Mr. WILSON. Sir, we want to fill up our armies. Six months preceding the 30th of June last we raised thirty-one thousand by volunteering. From the 30th of June, when the draft commenced, up to the latter part of December, we raised eighty-six thousand men under the pressure of the draft and by the commutation money furnished from the draft. We are receiving now a vast number of men, and if these bounties are continued to the 1st day of February, I think we shall put into the field more than half the men called for by the Government.

Instead of striking out this $300 provision, which was at one time so misunderstood and so misrepresented, but which in its practical workings has proved so favorable to the poor and toiling men of the country, so much so that it enabled forty-seven thousand of them to pay commutation—instead of repealing that clause, I would amend this bill and decrease the time of service from three years to eighteen months. I believe we ought to do it. Military men may be against it. They would like to have men enlisted for five years instead of three years. You always find that the men connected with the regular Army want long enlistments; but, sir, we are to determine that question, and determine it in view of the interests of the country and the burdens of our people. What are we doing? We ask for men. The Government has called for three hundred thousand men, and I presume that is the number the Government wants, either of old veterans who reenlist, or of new men. More than half of those men I think we shall have enlisted within the next twenty or thirty days. Then we shall have a draft in the portions of the country that fail to furnish their quotas. Why is it that it is necessary to offer these enormous bounties for men to enlist for three years? Why is it that we are drafting men for three years, which to many men appears almost an eternity, when there is not a man of us who believes that the military power of the rebellion can stand twelve months longer?

If we were to call out men to be placed in new regiments, under new officers—mere militia—I would not be willing to reduce the time of service; but we are to put these men into old veteran regiments, where, in thirty days, they will be fit for service. If we reduce the time from three years down to eighteen months, and find a year hence that the military power of the rebellion is not crushed, then we can make a draft for eighteen months longer. I believe the country would hail and welcome this reduction; it would bear more lightly on the people. Thousands of small farmers, mechanics, and laboring men, instead of selling their farms or their shops, or running in debt, to furnish substitutes or pay the $300 commutation money, would resolve to go into the service and do their part for the suppression of the rebellion. We ought to adopt it, and let this $300 provision stand in the act. If people choose, rather than go for eighteen months into the old regiments, to get a substitute, or if they choose to pay the $300, let the Government take the $300 and get substitutes for them. The Government can get substitutes enough. The Senator from Indiana complains that the Government have not got the substitutes. They have got them, and more too, for we have had to appropriate the money to pay for them. But where did many of these substitutes come from? I understand we have raised more than five thousand men in the State of Arkansas. We have raised four or five thousand men in East Tennessee. We are raising men in the rebel States among the Union men of those States, as our armies advance, and it is for the interests of the country to have the means to enlist those men, and transfer as far as we can the burden of war from the loyal States to the disloyal sections of the country. Every white man and every black man we put into the service from the rebel States weakens the rebellion so much and strengthens the country.

I want to adopt a policy that shall bear as lightly as possible upon our people—upon our productive industry—and shall fill up our armies. That is the first question; and I want to save the Treasury all the expense that can possibly be saved. I believe our danger is more from want of money than from want of men. I have believed through the war, and I never had any doubt, that Jeff Davis's kingdom would tumble down for want of money, however bravely his men might fight or rush to the battle-field. He is going down. He is perishing every hour because he has not money and cannot get money; and we are strong because our finances have been so managed that we have been able to meet our obligations and keep our currency comparatively sound.

It appears to me that in raising men at this crisis of the war to put into the old regiments for three years, we are compelled to pay double the bounties we should pay if the term of service was only a year and a half; and if we draft, we are putting what the people believe to be a burden upon them by drafting for three years. When you say to a young man that he shall be drafted and serve three years, he feels that it is a great portion of his life; but if you say to him he shall only be drafted for twelve or eighteen months, he begins to think that is not a long period, and he goes into the service more cheerfully and feels it to be less of a burden.

But the Senator from Indiana tells us that we pay a bounty of $300 to a raw recruit, and we let him off for $300. He told us that we paid a bounty of $400 to a veteran, and allowed a drafted man to escape on the payment of only $300. The Senator forgot to tell us that by law we pay a bounty of $100, and when the Government reenlists a veteran, it uses precisely the $300 received from a drafted man to obtain a substitute and the $100 now appropriated by law.

I have prepared an amendment to the bill, to reduce the time of service of drafted men from three years to eighteen months. I believe it the wisest thing we can do to fill our armies, and have them ready at the opening of the spring. Then, if it is found necessary, the Government can call for more men at any other time. If we find before Congress adjourns that the position of affairs requires us to make a change for the future, we can do so. If we find a year hence that the rebellion is not broken down, then we can change the law or we can call for men for eighteen months more. When the proposition now before the Senate is disposed of, I propose to offer this amendment, and test the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. COWAN. I hope, sir, that the present pending amendment will not be adopted. I have become satisfied in my own mind from everything I have seen and heard in relation to the draft that the law is now in this respect just about as well as we can make it, and what is better, the people now understand it and its operation. That is a great deal in any law, if it is once understood and accepted by the people.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that the time for which the President calls for these men is too long. Three years is too long a term, and that was really the main objection on the part of the people to serve under the late draft. If it had been one year, or if it had been eighteen months, I think the response would have been such a one as would have gratified the country; but to ask a man to serve for three years in the Army is about equivalent to asking him to go for a lifetime; because, in three years the chances are very much against his returning safely in life and limb. But, sir, it seems to me the responsibility for that is upon the executive department of this Government. There is nothing in the law which obliged them to call for men for three years, and it was expressly understood here, in the discussion of the bill last year, that it should be at the option of the President as to the length of time for which he would call the men out.

There is another thing which I wish to suggest here. I think the seventeenth section of the original bill requires amendment, and it requires it simply because it is not fair. That section provides—

"That any person enrolled and drafted according to the provisions of this act, who shall furnish an acceptable substitute, shall thereupon receive from the board of enrollment a certificate of discharge from such draft."

Now, if the section stopped there it would be all right, but it goes further, and declares that that

"Shall exempt him from military duty during the time for which he was drafted; and such substitute shall be entitled to the same pay and allowances provided by law as if he had been originally drafted into the service of the United States."

It is obvious at first sight, if we suppose the substitute liable to draft, that this allows two men to escape by performing the service to which each might have been liable. Therefore I think that the same construction ought to be put that, which is the true one, in my opinion, has been put upon the thirteenth section. That is the section which it is now proposed to repeal, the section which allows the exemption upon payment of $300. The effect of that, as stated in the section itself, is this:

"And thereupon such person so furnishing the substitute, or paying the money, shall be discharged from further liability under that draft."

The fair meaning of that is, that when the President of the United States calls for three hundred thousand men, and the draft is made, and a man stands his chance and is drawn and furnishes a substitute, he shall not be put into the wheel and made subject until the whole of that quota shall be filled; or, in other words, he is not again liable to draft under that call. In the same way, if he furnishes a substitute, he ought not to be liable unless his substitute, being liable to draft, should himself be drafted, and if in that case he is drafted, the principal should stand for him. It will be found upon an examination of the several provisions of the State laws, the old militia laws, that they always provided for such a result; that is, where the substitute was accepted, and the substitute himself being liable to draft was afterwards drafted, then his principal was bound to answer for him.

I think that alteration should be made in this law, and I would agree to that amendment; but any amendment affecting the $300 clause now I think would be injudicious. I do not see upon what principle the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is based. Under the draft the people are drawn by lot; it is by chance; and if a man is drawn to serve, that is his ill-luck. There are eight or ten others of his fellows who would be drawn. You tell him he can avoid serving either by getting a substitute or paying $300. But the amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts seems to threaten him with a surcharged amount of ill-luck. He proposes not only to compel him to pay $300, but because he happens to be rich he taxes him three, six, or ten per cent. in proportion to his income. If we had all the rich people in that category it might be fair; but it will be remembered that he has only one out of some ten or a dozen, and that one drawn by lot. Therefore I think it is not fair. Let there be a fair administration of the law, and let its hand be laid on the people equally, and my word for it the people will respond, and will respond generously. Make it unfair; make it severe and harsh, and they will not respond.

I think the honorable Senator from Indiana in his argument forgot a most important fact in the consideration of the operation of the draft. He assumes that all men are soldiers. That is not so. There are a certain number of gamecocks in every community, and there are a certain number of other men who are not soldiers, who are not fitted for that life, and who would be of no use in the field; and yet they are liable to perform their duty to the country; they are liable to do what they can, what they are qualified to do, but I think even in the earliest times they were allowed to commute for their personal service by the payment of money. Anciently, in feudal times they paid escuage. They paid a certain sum for the absence of the escutcheon or shield which they were bound to carry into the wars with their lord. I think it will be found in the commutations of the people everywhere, when they came to demand from their masters exemptions from former burdens, that one of them was, that they should not be compelled to go into the military service, but that they should be allowed to commute after the fashion of escuage. I do not know that there has ever been any great popular commotion in any country in Europe in which that was not made one of the demands, when asking for their Magna Charta; and therefore I have always been in favor of this provision exempting weak, timid men, men not qualified to take the field and become soldiers, upon paying a certain amount of money. I think it is well that that sum should be fixed and certain, so that they may know what it is. I am pleased to say, too, that I think no man, at least no man in my neighborhood, of whose case I was cognizant, was unable to raise the $300 to pay his commutation. The law therefore is satisfactory as it is, and I think ought not to be changed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. My object in making this motion is to have a treaty referred. I am satisfied we shall not get through with this bill to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, January 11, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions are in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a privileged question. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his question.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to have the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] for my expulsion, on the last day that the Senate was in session, taken up and considered.

Mr. WILSON. I hope not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator will allow us to present petitions.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to the introduction of morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I do for the present. If the Chair please, some gentlemen suggest to me to withdraw the motion until the morning business be got through with, and I do it for that purpose.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of the religious Society of Friends of the State of New York, praying for exemption from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of the religious Society of Friends of the State of New York, praying for exemption from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, praying Congress to pass a law providing for a uniform ambulance corps for the armies of the United States. This is signed by upward of fifty citizens of Massachusetts, among whom are the Governor of the Commonwealth, the executive council, many members of the State senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, the bishop of the diocese, and also other distinguished citizens. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented three petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that the Constitution of the United States may be so amended as to prohibit slavery in all the States and Territories of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOSTER presented the petition of John Cornwall and others, merchants of Bridgeport, Connecticut, praying that the petition of the South American Steamship Company, asking aid to establish postal communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America, may be granted; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE presented additional papers in relation to the petition of William Porter and William Larkins, praying for relief; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of George A. Schreiner, pilot of the steamer Sunshine, praying for a pension for the loss of an arm at the battle of Lexington, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POMEROY. I also present the petition of Mrs. Rebecca M. Dickson and other women of Douglas county, Kansas, some two hundred in number, praying that Congress may take action for the amendment of the Constitution so as to provide for the abolition of slavery throughout the United States; and I have another petition of the same character, signed by two hundred men of Douglas county, Kansas, making the same prayer.

This petition has peculiar significance to my mind from the fact that twelve of the men who signed it on the 18th day of August last were massacred on the 21st day of August, at the time of the destruction of Lawrence, and this is their last effort and prayer in this direction. I take up the sentiment that they expressed in this petition, and take it up where they left off, and hope and pray that the prayer of the petition may in some way be granted. There is no suitable committee to which to refer these petitions specially, and I should therefore like to have them lie on the table until some committee be appointed that shall have the subject in charge.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Garrett R. Barry, paymaster in the United States Navy, praying to be relieved from all responsibility as bondsman for Paymaster John De Bree, for loss, in consequence of the disaster to the United States frigate Cumberland; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Mary Wacontah, Martha Wacontah, and Lucy Carron, half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dakota or Sioux nation of Indians, praying that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may be authorized to issue to them Sioux half-breed certificates or scrip, under the same restrictions that applied to the certificates issued to the former recipients of the scrip in November, 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented a petition of the "Chicago Workingmen's Association," of Chicago, Illinois, praying that the $300 exemption clause may be stricken out of the enrollment law, and also the clause authorizing the employment of substitutes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN. I present a memorial of the religious Society of Friends of the State of New York, praying for exemption from military service; and I also present the memorial of the presbytery of Saltsburg, Pennsylvania, praying that clergymen may be exempt from military service. As these subjects are now under consideration in the Senate, I suppose these memorials may lie on the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. COWAN also presented the petition of Henry Kauffelt and others, praying compensation for their property destroyed by the United States Army at Wrightsville, York county, Pennsylvania, in burning the bridge across the Susquehanna at that point; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, praying for indemnification for damage done to buildings belonging to him while they were used by the Government, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was also Ordered, That the memorial of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, praying for a repeal of the joint resolution of December 23, 1853, relative to the salary of the Secretary of the Census Board, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the memorial of the common council of the city of St. Paul, praying for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul to the head of Lake Superior, ask to be discharged from its further consideration, in pursuance of the rule which the committee has adopted not to print memorials.

The report was concurred in.

DISTRICT LAWS.

Mr. GRIMES. On Friday last a communication from R. S. Cox, appointed by the President of the United States to codify and revise the laws of the District of Columbia, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The report embraces a great many interesting and instructive facts which the committee believe it is important to have printed. They have therefore instructed me to move that the communication of Mr. Cox be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 45) to set apart a portion of the State of Texas for the use of persons of African descent; which was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To what committee shall the bill be referred?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The committee to which that bill is to be referred is not yet organized. I therefore move that for the present it lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 46) to remove doubts on the construction of the joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. As that bill relates to a very important question that has already been brought to the notice of the Senate at this session, I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate, and be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 47) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to issue Sioux half-breed certificates or scrip to certain persons therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McDougall asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 13) in relation to the occupation of Mexico; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 16) proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

CUSTODY OF DRAFT COMMUTATION MONEY.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for bounties to volunteers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say that this is an amendment to a joint resolution passed during the present session, and is strongly recommended by the Secretary of War. It is a slight change in that resolution in regard to the payment and keeping in the Treasury of the money paid in from the commutation fund; and if there be no objection, it would be an advantage to pass it at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this resolution at the present time. Is there any objection?

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which directs that the money paid by drafted persons under the act for calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, or that may be paid under any act for like purposes, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be drawn out on requisitions, as other public moneys, for the expenses of the draft, and for the procurement of substitutes, for which purpose the money so paid is now appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRIMES. I confess I do not understand it. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if there is any necessity for this bill being passed at once without being printed.

Mr. WILSON. There is.

Mr. GRIMES. Without being printed?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no. I will tell the Senator all the difference there is between this resolution and what is already done. The joint resolution we passed in December provided that this money should be deposited in the Treasury and set apart as a special fund. The Secretary of the Treasury finds great difficulty in that arrangement, and desires that it shall be put into the general Treasury, and drawn out on warrant for this special purpose. That is all the difference. It was suggested the other day, when we had that resolution under consideration, by the Senator from Vermont, and I think that is the proper way.

Mr. COLLAMER. I tried to get it then.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARREST OF SOLDIERS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. WILKINSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to inform the Senate whether he has any official information in his Department relating to the arrest and imprisonment by the military authorities in Missouri of a large number of the private soldiers belonging to the ninth Minnesota regiment; also, as to the cause of their arrest and imprisonment, how many have been so arrested, and how long they have been confined in prison.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, some time in the month of September or October last, five regiments of Minnesota volunteers were sent into the State of Missouri. One of those regiments, the ninth Minnesota volunteers, was sent to and stationed at Jefferson City. A few days after they were encamped at that city, a negro came into the camp and told the private soldiers that he was a freeman, and that his master was a rebel who had gone into the service of the confederate government. He also stated to the soldiers that some men, by the permission of the commandant of that post, one General Brown, I believe, had the wife and children of this negro on board the cars, taking them South for sale. These soldiers having been recently sent down there from the pure atmosphere of Minnesota, thought that this was an outrage, and about forty of them, as I learn, started for the depot, found the train of cars standing there with the passengers all on board, and took the woman and children out of the hands of the traitors who were conveying them out of the State, and delivered them over to their husband and father. This was probably eight weeks ago. Thereupon forty of these soldiers were arrested and put into prison, where they now remain, as I understand. In regard to the facts, I wish to read an extract from a letter that I have received from a member of that regiment:

"You have undoubtedly learned that under the Schofield regime about forty of our men, of companies C and K, have been in prison at this place for weeks past, for merely preventing an openly announced rebel from running his slaves to St. Louis for sale. (While I cannot possibly, under my present restraint of Army regulation, speak fully as I would wish in this particular, I can characterize the outrage of imprisoning these men as unjustifiable, and an act of military official baseness that certainly demands inquiry beyond the jurisdiction of the pro-slavery tyrants who have caused their incarceration.)"

I received another letter from a member of this regiment a few days after it was stationed at Jefferson City, stating that one of the privates going fresh into the Army from our State was arrested, that a ball and chain were attached to his leg, and that he was compelled to drag them around the camp, for the offense of having hallooed for Jim Lane. I do not know that he knew much about Senator LANE; but my impression is that these things in the State of Missouri must stop. I, for one, am not willing that a private soldier shall be thus incarcerated and kept in prison, and the men of that regiment, and indeed all our soldiers in that State, be demoralized, to gratify the pro-slavery feelings of the officers in command in that State.

I wish further to know, Mr. President, whether these things are done by the local military authorities of the State of Missouri, or whether they are done under the sanction of the authorities here in Washington. While we are devising all the means in our power to raise soldiers to recruit our armies, a power is found in the State of Missouri which is demoralizing our soldiers; for I say before the Senate to-day that these five thousand men from my State in Missouri cannot and will not make good soldiers if they are to be placed and kept under the control of such men as seem to be governing the military authorities in that State. This regiment will be utterly demoralized if these soldiers are not released from their confinement, and I venture to say that it is as good a regiment as is to be found anywhere in our Army. It is true that its members have an idea somehow that a negro whose master is in rebellion is a free man; it is true that they thought also that his wife and children belong to him; and perhaps they may have committed some little act of insubordination in not obeying the command of General Brown, who, I have learned, was on the train of cars from which these colored people were taken; but one thing is very certain, that if we want these men to fight they must be treated a little differently. I have offered this resolution for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Department knows anything about the arrest and imprisonment of these men, and I shall insist, as the representative of the State of Minnesota, that our soldiers shall be treated differently in the future than they have been in the past in the State of Missouri. I will never consent that they shall be made the tools of the slavery-loving tyrants of Missouri.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, the Secretary of War will have no difficulty, if he takes the proper steps, in ascertaining that scores if not hundreds of soldiers have been confined in the guard-houses of Missouri for no other offense than hallooing for Jim Lane. It is currently reported that two soldiers at Chillicothe, in that State, were bayoneted for no other offense than that.

Mr. SUMNER. By whose orders?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will endeavor to answer before I close. On that occasion it is reported there were five soldiers arrested for that offense. Four of them were forced into jail; two of them were bayoneted while they were being forced into jail; the fifth escaped. The company to which these five men belonged was stationed some five or six miles from Chillicothe. The fifth man went over from that town, told the story to the company, and the company en masse started for Chillicothe, released the four men who were incarcerated, and compelled the commander who had incarcerated them to halloo for Jim Lane. What became of him, whether he died of the loyal dose or not, I am not able to say; but the rumor is as I have stated.

I desire to say to the Senator from Minnesota that the matter is under investigation, as I understand, by a committee of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, now in session. I am very thankful to him that he has called the attention of the War Department to the subject. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that I think it will be found that the Gamble régime is responsible; the officers appointed by the Governor of the State are the criminals. The soldiers are unconditional Union men, anti-slavery all of them, with scarcely an exception. The officers appointed by the Gamble régime are, I think I can say, almost without exception pro-slavery men. It has been the practice—and if I am mistaken the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] can correct me—that when a man in the military service of the State of Missouri is found unconditionally loyal and anti-slavery in his feelings, that has been a sufficient cause for his removal, and he has been immediately removed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly desire that the resolution shall be passed, as it is a resolution of inquiry. It is perhaps very appropriate that the inquiry should be made. I will state, however, that I know nothing of the circumstances alluded to in the resolution in reference to the arrest of these men by General Brown. I know General Brown personally; I have not known him a great while; but I am very well satisfied that there must be some mistake in the representation that General Brown is a pro-slavery man. I have not so regarded him. He has been in command at Jefferson City for some time. It is true that I am not very familiar with his history. I know simply that he fought with a great deal of gallantry at Springfield and lost his arm there, and that he has behaved with great gallantry whenever he has been called upon to do his share in the defense of the country. That is as much as I know of him. I know nothing of the circumstances alluded to in the resolution. It is a resolution of inquiry; and if the soldiers have been improperly treated there it is but just that the country should know it; but I cannot for a moment think there is any correctness in the inference drawn here that General Brown has mistreated the soldiers from Minnesota in consequence of any pro-slavery feeling on his part. It may, however, be the case. I should like to have the facts, and therefore I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am very glad that some step has been taken to initiate an inquiry into the military management of affairs in the State of Missouri. I venture the assertion that no State in its military affairs has been so disastrously managed as my own. I do not propose at the present time, but shall take some other occasion, to enter into the discussion of that management in its details, and to suggest what I believe to be the remedy. I desire simply to state now that I have received communications from loyal members of the Legislature at Jefferson City, setting forth the facts in regard to the case which has been alluded to by the Senator from Minnesota, and they confirm the statement which he has made. They go on further to say, what I can very well understand, that it is only part and parcel of the programme which has prevailed there for more than a year past. I can also indorse the statement made by the Senator from Kansas in regard to the warfare which has been made in that State by the military authority upon the free-soilers of Missouri. It is true, sir, every letter of it is true. I can go further than that, sir, and say that it is done not alone by the Gamble dynasty and the appointees of the Governor of Missouri, but it is sanctioned, indorsed, and urged on by the military commander of the United States in that department.

Mr. HOWARD. Name him.

Mr. BROWN. Schofield. I trust, sir, the resolution will pass, and I trust we shall have an opportunity to take a full review of the acts of oppression and of hostility to the loyal, freedom-loving sentiment in that State, and that we shall be able before long to take such action as will preclude its continuance there.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRINTING OF CENSUS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That in addition to the number ordered for the use of the Senate of the several parts of the eighth census, there be printed and bound one thousand copies for the use of the Secretary of the Interior, and one thousand copies for the use of the Census Office.

CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That such of the clerks to the standing committees of the Senate as have been on duty since the first day of this session be paid therefrom.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

Mr. DAVIS. I now renew the motion that I submitted some half hour since to take up the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] in relation to my expulsion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not prepared to take up that resolution at the present time. In lieu of it, I was going to propose that the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Kentucky be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution indicated by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If those resolutions are of the nature I understand them to be, I am prepared to vote to exclude the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that resolution will not be taken up this morning. In my opinion, it involves some very serious and grave considerations and matters, into which I, for one, desire a little more time to make inquiry. It is a matter undoubtedly of considerable importance to the Senator from Kentucky. It is important, also, to every member of this body, and the good name of the body, and to its future history. I hope the Senate will not now take it up for consideration, but will allow it to lie over a few days, for it is my intention, so far as I am concerned, to say a word on the resolution when it comes up fully before the body, and I am not prepared this morning to go on with the remarks that I may be able to make upon it. It is a grave and important resolution, as the gentleman from Kentucky will discover before it is finished in this body, and we ought to approach it with care and caution.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Carlisle] is expected to announce to-day the death of our late colleague. That suggestion should be a sufficient reason, I think, why we should not enter upon the consideration of the resolution referred to in the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. I had not intended to disparage or to underrate the gravity of the resolution under consideration, so far as it affects me personally or the Senate, now or in the future. I am well apprised of its gravity. Neither am I surprised to hear the Senator from Kansas announce his purpose to vote for my exclusion from the Senate. But, sir, the resolutions which I submitted to the Senate were laid upon the tables of members on the 5th of this month, and every gentleman who chose, and I suppose most of them have done so, has had an opportunity to read them. The Senator from Massachusetts on Friday last drew up an indictment against me, embodying one of those resolutions, in part, and, for reasons deduced by him from it, asking for my expulsion from the Senate as a member thereof. Now, Mr. President, I am, as it were, under arrest, not exactly military arrest, of which the Senator from Massachusetts seems so much enamored, but still a sort of arrest.

I am entitled to a seat on this floor rightfully or I am not; and that is the question I want decided by the Senate.

If Senators were not prepared, or had not had an opportunity of being prepared to understand this subject, and to act advisedly upon it, I certainly would accord to the suggestions of different gentlemen, and desire that the matter should be postponed to give them time to make fresh investigation; but I presume that every Senator here present, as the Senator from Kansas has so promptly avowed himself, is ready to act upon and to vote on this resolution. If there be no real cause why this subject should not be considered now, it is a matter of injustice to myself that I should thus be left suspended before the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts avowed that he had undertaken this proceeding and introduced this resolution without consulting a Senator. "Solitary and alone he put this ball in motion." But I suppose my resolutions attracted as much attention on the part of other Senators as on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that he had no more opportunity to be prepared to render a decision on the resolution to which he has particularly referred, and every other resolution embraced in the series, than other gentlemen had, and that they are as well prepared, with the exception probably of the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Howard.]

The Senator from Michigan avows it as his purpose to say something on this matter. Be it so. I suppose other Senators, probably several, will say something upon the matter too. If so, there will be ample time for the Senator from Michigan to look into the matter to make any investigations or researches that he may choose either of fact or of authority, and to prepare himself fully and deliberately to give his views, which are always so able and so satisfactory upon all subjects of which he chooses to enter into the discussion, to the Senate.

Gentlemen can well conceive the position in which I am placed. I do not expect them to act from any courtesy or kindness to me. I do not ask it. All I ask is justice, that they shall act toward me in the premises as they would be willing and desirous for others to act toward themselves.

I do hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will take up this resolution and enter upon its consideration; and after it is taken up and entered upon, whatever time the honorable Senator from Michigan may desire, I shall not only concur in, but I myself shall insist he shall have in order to make the fullest preparation he may desire.

Mr. WILSON. If it be in order, I will move to assign the resolution for consideration on Wednesday next, at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the resolution should be taken up, it would then be in order to move a time certain for its consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest whether, as a question of privilege, it be not before the Senate when it is suggested to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest whether it requires any vote to take up a question of privilege?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair it does, and the Chair has so ruled uniformly, that it does require a motion; that it does not come up of its own power, although it is a privileged question.

Mr. FOSTER. I will suggest that there is a difference between a privileged question and a question of privilege. This is a question of privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly; but still it is within the control of the Senate, subject to the notion and action of the Senate, whether a question of privilege or a privileged question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the resolution will not be taken up and assigned to any day this week. We have very important business before us that should be considered this week. I have not yet read the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. It is a considerable task to read them carefully. We have had only one day's vacation this last week, and I think we ought to postpone this subject until some time when we adjourn over from Thursday to Monday, and when we can have an opportunity to read those resolutions. I hope this resolution will not be taken up until we have got through with the enrollment bill.

Mr. DAVIS. As there seems to be an indisposition to consider the subject now, I should be gratified if the Senate would allow the resolution to be taken up this morning, and an early day assigned for its consideration. I will ask that from the courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise for the purpose of inquiring from the Senator from Kentucky whether, if the resolution were taken up now, he would be willing to have it postponed until Wednesday next, or any other day in the future the Senate may think proper to fix.

Mr. DAVIS. Most certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say, however, that in my opinion—I speak it with all proper respect for the opinion of the Senate—a resolution like this to expel a Senator should be disposed of at once. I can very readily understand that the Senator from Kentucky feels sensitive while such a resolution is on the table. Whatever time the debate to which it may give rise shall take of the other business of the Senate is not so much his fault, if it be a fault at all, as the fault of the Senator from Massachusetts, who proposed the resolution. But speaking for myself, and judging of the feelings of the Senator from Kentucky by those which I am sure would actuate me, I never could sit still without constant and hourly effort to have the resolution disposed of.

Mr. FOSTER. I confess I had supposed that a question of this kind, when brought before the Senate by motion or by remark, became the question before the Senate, and that, as a question of privilege, it excluded any question then pending, taking priority of all other questions. The decision of the Chair, however, is adverse to me, and of course I yield to it. I must, however, think that, if that be not the rule, propriety requires that a question of this sort should be disposed of at the earliest possible day. I confess if such a resolution were pending in regard to me I should insist pertinaciously upon having it disposed of as speedily as possible, and I should think the Senate were unjust to me if they did not do so. I am willing to mete out to others the same measure that I would ask to have meted out to myself. If, therefore, the Senator from Kentucky wishes this resolution taken up and considered at the present time, unless there be some great public question here paramount to all individual rights and interests, I shall vote to take it up and to consider it.

Mr. HOWE. I rose just now substantially to say what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut better than I could have said it myself. I am in the condition of the Senator from Rhode Island precisely. I have never read, and I do not know that I have ever seen the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, and upon the doctrines of which, as I understand it, the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts is predicated. But I do not understand that there is any question of fact to be inquired into. We need no investigation. I understand the misconduct, whatever it may be, attributed to the Senator from Kentucky, is apparent upon the face of certain resolutions that he has introduced here. If the Senator impeached is anxious for a speedy trial, although there may be no clause of the Constitution which gives it to him, it seems to me every rule of propriety requires us to accede to him a trial as early as he sees fit to ask it. I understand, however, from the Senator that he does not propose to press the discussion this morning. He asks the Senate to proceed to its consideration, and is then entirely willing that the discussion of it shall be postponed to a day certain, if the day be an early one, and I understand he is not very particular as to the precise day that shall be assigned. I hope the Senator will be gratified in this regard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to take up the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WILSON on Friday last:

Whereas the Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, did, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions in which, among other things, it is declared that "the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands," thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States and those in authority who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union, and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States, and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled.

Mr. DAVIS. If my own wishes could be consulted in relation to the subject, I would ask that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration, but I do not desire to seem ungracious or to press unreasonably the consideration of this resolution. I will therefore move that it be postponed to and made the special order for Wednesday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, during the recess, death has made vacant the seat beside me. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, my colleague in this body, died, in this city, on Saturday, the 2d instant. Mr. BOWDEN resided in the extreme eastern part of our State, several hundred miles from me, and with his early life I am entirely unacquainted. I first met him in 1851, as a member of the convention that formed the present constitution of our State. In that body he early took rank among its readiest and ablest debaters. Residing in a section of the State where the people were almost a unit in favor of secession, he never faltered in his devotion to the Union. He was an able lawyer, an accomplished gentleman, a sincere patriot, and an honest man. I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

The Senate having received the sad intelligence that (during the recess of the two Houses of Congress) Hon. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, Senator of the United States from the State of Virginia, departed this life in the city of Washington, on Saturday, the 2d instant, and also that the funeral was conducted under the arrangement of the committee appointed for that purpose by the Vice President, and carried out by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate, in order to testify their respect for the memory of Hon. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Virginia, will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, although my acquaintance with Mr. BOWDEN was not very intimate, yet it was sufficient to justify me in saying that the Senate and the country have cause to regret his demise. He was, I understand, about fifty-two years of age at the time of his death. He was an eminent lawyer. Perhaps there were none more so in lower Virginia. He had served two or three sessions as a delegate to the General Assembly of Virginia, acquitting himself honorably and with benefit to the State. I first became acquainted with him in 1851, during the session of the constitutional convention of Virginia, of which he was a member. The question which absorbed the especial attention of that body, was the basis of representation in the two Houses of the General Assembly. The people of the western part of the State insisted that representation should be apportioned according to white population, or the right of suffrage. The people of the eastern section of the Commonwealth demanded that it should be apportioned according to population and property or taxation. The former was called "the white basis," sometimes "the suffrage basis;" the latter was called "the mixed basis," sometimes "the black basis." The alleged policy of the mixed or black basis was to protect the eastern part of the State, largely interested in slaves, against oppressive and inordinate taxation by the western part of the State, which had a large majority of white population, but comparatively few slaves. Mr. BOWDEN was one of the very few members of the convention residing east of the Blue Ridge who espoused the principle of the right of suffrage as the true source of the legislative power of the State, and planted himself firmly on "the white basis;" consequently he became the object of the most violent denunciation both in the convention and out of it. Public meetings were called in the district which he represented, and strong efforts were made to instruct him to resign his seat; but he went home, met his adversaries everywhere on the hustings, defeated their designs, and was nobly sustained by his constituents. I am happy to-day, Mr.

President, to be made the organ through whom the people I represent on this floor acknowledge the debt of gratitude which they owe to the deceased for the disinterested and distinguished services which he rendered to them on that occasion. West Virginia will ever cherish his memory.

But the firmness with which Mr. BOWDEN always adhered to his convictions of what was right, has received more recent and more signal illustration during the present melancholy rebellion. He resisted the principle and policy of secession from first to last. Residing in a section of the State where this fallacy was most rampant, he kept himself free from all taint of disloyalty. Surrounded by the most illustrious champions of those delusive ideas of State supremacy over national allegiance, always so predominant, and now so fatally disastrous, in Virginia, he maintained his integrity unimpaired, and, at the risk of his life, never forfeited either his self-respect or his fealty to the national Government. When the authorities of the insurrectionary organization at Richmond seized his property for the payment of taxes, he paid the taxes to save his property from sacrifice, but not until the collector had given him a certificate that the payment was made under duress.

One of the most effective agencies which the haughty instigators of the rebellion have brought to bear upon the people of the South, is the exclusion from all social relations of those who refuse to adhere to their guilty cause. Mr. BOWDEN, living at the very seat of the ancient aristocracy of Virginia, constantly receiving and elegantly dispensing those hospitalities for which Virginia has been so famous, was literally driven from society with the most imperial contempt. Yet, thus isolated and ostracized—standing alone, as it were, in the midst of former friends—contemned—hissed at—shunned as a leper, he never faltered in his allegiance, but patiently awaited the hour when the returning flag of the Republic should rescue him from his captivity and his disgrace. It did come; but only remained long enough to allow him to escape to a place of greater security. When the forces under General McClellan evacuated the Peninsula, where Mr. BOWDEN resided, he deemed it prudent to retire with them. Then followed rapine and confiscation by the rebel government, until the accumulations of a life of professional toil, amounting as I am informed to near one hundred thousand dollars, were swept away, and he was an exile from his native State, rich now only in a loyalty which no wealth could bribe or corrupt, no adversity diminish, no power subdue.

Such, sir, are the price and the penalties of loyalty in the States in rebellion. Elsewhere it may be a sentiment—there it is a fact. Sir, traitors are entitled to no concession. Thus far they have asked none. But shall I depart from the proprieties of the present hour, or unwarrantably disturb its sacred solemnities, if I shall say that to the Union men of the South it would be magnanimous to make concessions? Nay, would it not be just and wise?

In politics, Mr. BOWDEN usually acted with the Whig party. But in this, as in every other department of life, his independence of thought and conduct was conspicuous. He never hesitated to sacrifice his attachments for his party to his regard for his principles. The obligations of the patriot were paramount to the prejudices and passions of the partisan. His great rule of life seemed to be, to seek to know the right and then to pursue it, regardless of all personal consequences. This distinguishing feature of his character was never more manifest than since the commencement of the existing insurrection. He appeared to have renounced all party feelings and affinities, and to have dedicated himself, without reservation, to the sole great purpose of suppressing the rebellion and restoring the Union and the Constitution. It was on the very day when he took his seat as a member of this body that I heard him refer approvingly to the noble sentiments uttered by Mr. Douglas shortly before his death, that "There can be but two sides to the present controversy. Every man must be on the side of the United States or against it. There can be no neutrals in this war." * * * "Whoever is not prepared to sacrifice party organizations and platforms on the altar of his country, does not deserve the support and countenance of an honest people. We must cease discussing party issues, make no allusions to old parry tests, have no eriminations and recriminations, indulge in no taunts one against another, as to who has been the cause of these troubles."

But, sir, the deceased is now beyond the reach of either the praise of his friends or the persecution of his enemies. No traitorous violence shall assail him more. He has gone to his reward. I am not advised of his religious views or hopes. But I am safe, I think, in saying that one so true to his country could hardly be false to his Creator.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, after the army of the Potomac, in its advance up the Peninsula, had reached Williamsburg, the home of the lamented Senator whose death has just been announced, he called upon me to represent the condition of his few loyal friends and neighbors, and to consult concerning our affairs in Virginia. I saw that he was actuated by an intense, vehement, and passionate devotion to the Union, and to the institutions of his country. I saw, too, that he was a gentleman of capacity, of large intelligence, and rare information concerning men and affairs in the rebel States. The hand of rebel power had been laid heavily upon him and upon his kindred. Advancing and retreating armies had desolated his fields, devoured his harvests, and wasted his substance; but he seemed ready to sacrifice all for his country, menaced by rebel power. He had stood inflexibly by his country when the timid shrank back and the false betrayed her. He invoked the protection of the Government for the faithful and fearless few in the land of the rebellion, and demanded the repression of rebel tyranny by the vigor of war. To the Government of his country he gave heart and voice and vote, till he sank into a patriot's grave. To our sick and wounded heroes in the hospitals of Williamsburg he gave the word of sympathy and the deed of charity, which they will gratefully remember in their northern homes.

On entering the Senate Mr. BOWDEN was assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs. Brief as was his connection with the committee, his colleagues will ever bear witness that in the committee he ever evinced his readiness to sustain the measures of his Government tending to the suppression of the rebellion and the restoration of the Union, and to deal justly by the men whose names passed before us. I am sure I but express the sentiments of the members of the committee and of the Senate when I say that he was devoted to his country, fair, liberal, and high-minded in his action, and tolerant toward all but the enemies of his country.

Mr. BOWDEN was a true representative of the sentiment of Virginia when she followed the patriotic counsels of Washington and Marshall, Jefferson and Madison, and the illustrious men who so longed in her councils and in the high places of the Republic. Smitten by a terrible disease, he has passed from this Chamber forever; but he leaves behind him a record redolent of patriotism. We, his comrades in the strife, will honor his name and cherish his memory by living in the hope that those who come after him in this Chamber may ever be animated by his fidelity to his country, by his broad, liberal, and expansive patriotism, that embraced the whole country and its institutions of freedom.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 11, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Thursday last was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. NORTON. I rise to a privileged question, and that is the correction of the Journal of Thursday last. In the Globe I do not find myself reported as having voted on the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BALDWIN,] or on the resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] I voted in favor of laying the latter upon the table, and in favor of the former. If the Journal is wrong in that respect, I ask that it be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded in the Journal as having voted in favor of the preamble to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BALDWIN,] but not on the other questions.

Mr. NORTON. I ask that the Journal be corrected. I voted for the preamble and resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BALDWIN,] and in favor of laying the resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] upon the table.

The Journal was corrected accordingly, and then approved.

DELEGATE FROM NEVADA.

Mr. COLE, of California, submitted the credentials of GORDON N. MOTT, Delegate elect from the Territory of Nevada.

Mr. MOTT presented himself at the Speaker's desk, and was sworn in.

DISTRICT LAWS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the commission to digest and revise the laws of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL MATTERS AT PHILADELPHIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General on postal matters at Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES STEAMER HOWQUA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, inclosing the report of Lieutenant Devens, of the United States steamer Howqua, as to the treatment of the officers and crew at Halifax, in June last; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BANKS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report on the banks of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE asked and obtained consent to be excused from further service on the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of States for bills on leave, for reference only.

Gardner; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, introduced a bill to provide for the payment of bounties to certain troops; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPAYMENT OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. ROGERS introduced a joint resolution to repay bounties; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARMY PAY.

Mr. ROGERS also introduced a bill to increase the pay of the Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask that these bills be ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

PENNSYLVANIA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. SCOFIELD introduced a bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into three judicial districts, and to establish a district court to be held in the city of Erie; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WASHINGTON SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. SCOFIELD also introduced a bill to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

JOHN C. CARTER.

Mr. SCOFIELD also introduced a joint resolution for the relief of John C. Carter; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

POWDER MAGAZINE IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill donating to the State of Pennsylvania certain lands in the county of Philadelphia for the erection thereon of a powder magazine; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

VEXATIOUS APPEALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, introduced a bill to prevent vexatious appeals; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, also introduced a bill to require certain persons to take the oath of allegiance; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NOBLE. I desire to offer a resolution, and have it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. This call is simply for bills and joint resolutions for reference.

OFFICERS, ETC., OF GUNBOAT CINCINNATI.

Mr. SPALDING introduced the following joint resolution; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized, in settling the accounts of the petty officers, seamen, and others of the crew of the United States gunboat Cincinnati, to allow to each of them all back pay, and a sum not exceeding fifty dollars for loss of clothing and other property by the sinking of said vessel in the Mississippi river, near Vicksburg, on the 27th day of May, 1863.

Mr. GRIDER. I desire to offer a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions are not in order under this call. This is a call for bills and joint resolutions for reference only. Resolutions will be in order when the States are called for resolutions.

PAY FOR LOSS OF SOLDIERS' CLOTHING, ETC.

Mr. ORTH, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to compensate non-commissioned officers, musicians, and private soldiers in the military service of the United States for the loss or destruction of clothing or equipments, where such loss or destruction is not the result of their own fault or neglect; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TWENTIETH REGIMENT INDIANA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. ORTH also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to reimburse the officers and men of the twentieth regiment of Indiana volunteers for loss of baggage and other property at Hatteras Inlet; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INCREASE OF PAY TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. ORTH also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to increase the pay of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and private soldiers in the military service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAYMENT TO SOLDIERS OF AFRICAN DESCENT.

Mr. ORTH also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to fix the pay and allowance of officers, musicians, and private soldiers of African descent in the military service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MILITIA IN THE STATE OF INDIANA.

Mr. ORTH also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for paying the expenses of enrolling and drafting the militia in the State of Indiana in the year 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THE CIVIL COMMISSION AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. HOLMAN, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to legalize and establish the civil commission at Memphis, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. As this is thought to be a matter of great importance, I move that the bill be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIP CANAL.

Mr. ARNOLD, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to construct a ship canal for the passage of armed and naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

DEPOSITARY OF PUBLIC MONEYS AT CHICAGO.

Mr. ARNOLD also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to regulate the compensation of the depositary of public moneys at Chicago; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend an act to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the first four sections of the bill be read for the information of the House.

The sections were read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, incorporated by an act of Congress approved May 17, 1862, shall, during all sessions of Congress, run one car each way every three minutes between ten o'clock in the morning and six o'clock in the evening, on their main railway between the eastern front of the Capitol and Georgetown, and shall travel thereon at a rate of speed not exceeding seven miles per hour, and not less than five miles per hour.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said railway company shall cause to be prepared, and shall sell to all passengers wishing to purchase, tickets in packages or parcels of twenty-five or less in number, at the rate of one dollar for twenty-five tickets; each of which tickets shall entitle the holder to one passage in any car of the company for any distance upon their main line of railway, or upon either of the branches thereof, or between the termini of either of said branches and any point upon said main railway or branches.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said railway company shall keep clear and in good repair the flagstones leading to and across their tracks at the crossing of the streets and avenues which intersect their lines of railway.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That for each and every violation or neglect of either of the provisions of the foregoing sections, the said railway company shall forfeit and pay a sum not less than five dollars and not more than $100; which may be recovered, with the costs of court, on complaint of any person in any court of record in the District of Columbia; and one half of the penalties recovered shall be for the use of and paid to the city of Washington; the other half for and to the complainant.

The bill was then referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

Mr. KNAPP, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the relief of Isaac R. Diller; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CONSCRIPTION LAW.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FEMALE COLLEGES.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a joint resolution asking an appropriation of land by Congress to endow female colleges in the several States; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PROTECTION OF EMIGRANTS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for the protection of overland emigrants to the States and Territories of the Pacific; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. McBRIDE, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill making an appropriation for the purpose of negotiating treaties with the Indian tribes of southern and eastern Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MAIL FACILITIES.

Mr. McBRIDE also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to establish a daily mail from Fort Bridger, in Utah Territory, to Dalles City, in the State of Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LOSSES IN KANSAS.

Mr. WILDER, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a joint resolution for the appointment of three commissioners, to ascertain the amount of losses sustained by the burning and sacking of the city of Lawrence and the towns of Olathe, Shawnee, Aubey, and Humboldt, in the State of Kansas, by guerrillas under Quantrel and others; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. WILDER. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON. I would suggest to the gentleman that the joint resolution had better be referred to the Committee of Claims. This whole subject is already under consideration by that committee, and they are preparing a general bill on the subject.

Mr. WILDER. I have no objection to its being so referred.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims.

PAY OF INDIAN REGIMENTS.

Mr. WILDER also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments, appointed and commissioned by the War Department, and mustered out of service without pay; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MORGAN'S RAID.

Mr. CRAVENS, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to ascertain who have lost horses and other property in the States of Indiana and Ohio by the rebel raid under the command of General John H. Morgan, and the Union forces in pursuit of said rebels, in July, 1863; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. CRAVENS. I move that the bill be referred to a select committee of three.

Mr. HARDING. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he had better let the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims. The losses in Indiana by raids have been nothing compared to those of Kentucky; and the Committee of Claims are maturing a general bill on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would state to my colleague that the subject is already before the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CRAVENS. I have no objection to the reference of the bill to that committee.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

MAIL FACILITIES IN THE WEST.

Mr. PEREA, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide additional mail facilities between Kansas City and Santa Fe, New Mexico; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LOSSES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PEREA also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for the settlement of losses sustained by the loyal people of New Mexico during the invasion of General Sibley, of Texas, out of the confiscated property of disloyal citizens of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF NEW MEXICO, &C.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to provide for a geological survey of the Territory of New Mexico and Arizona; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WAGON ROAD IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a wagon road from Albuquerque, New Mexico, to Fort Whipple, Arizona, and thence to steamboat navigation on the Colorado river in said Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THOMAS F. BOWLER.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill for the relief of Thomas F. Bowler, of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill for the examination of claims for Indian depredations in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN AGENTS.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to provide for the appointment of Indian agents in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CAPTAIN GARDIN CHAPIN.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill for the relief of Captain Gardin Chapin, seventh United States infantry, for private property lost and destroyed in the evacuation of Arizona by the United States troops; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

TREATIES WITH INDIANS.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to authorize the making of treaties with the Navajo, Apache, and Utah Indian tribes in New Mexico, defining their limits and extinguishing their title to lands outside of said limits; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MOUNTAIN ROAD IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to provide for the improvement of the road through the Raton mountains between Fort Lyon, in Colorado Territory, and Fort Union, in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

MILITARY ROAD IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a military road from Santa Fe, New Mexico, to Taos, New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MAJOR JOHN A. WHITTALL.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill for the relief of Major John A. Whittall, paymaster in the United States Army, on account of stolen vouchers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

VOLUNTEERS IN MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill for the payment of certain volunteer companies in the service of the United States in the war with Mexico, and in the suppression of Indian disturbances in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TERRITORIAL BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. PEREA also introduced a bill to provide for the running of the boundary line between the Territory of New Mexico and Arizona and the Territory of Colorado and New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PUGET SOUND COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, introduced an act fixing the port of entry for Puget sound collection district; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MILITARY ROAD IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, also introduced an act granting lands to the Territory of Washington to aid in the construction of a military road from Fort Walla-Walla to Puget sound; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LANDS FOR UNIVERSITY PURPOSES.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, also introduced an act to amend an act approved July 17, 1854, entitled "An act to amend the act approved September 27, 1850, to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon," &c.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MISS ANNA E. DICKINSON.

Mr. PIKE presented the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House be granted for an evening to Miss Anna E. Dickinson to deliver an address, the proceeds to be applied to the fund of the Freedman's Aid Association.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ANCONA moved that the resolution be laid upon the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Craven, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Herrick, Hohman, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKimney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, John B. Steele, Stronge, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Scheuck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—79.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. PENDLETON stated that he had been requested to state that Mr. BENJAMIN WOOD was confined to his bed by indisposition.

Mr. ROBINSON stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, was detained from the House by illness. The vote was then announced as above recorded. The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the report and tabular statements made and returned to him by the commissioners appointed by the President, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the release of certain persons held to service or labor in the District of Columbia," approved April 16, 1863, and an act supplementary thereto, approved July 12, 1862.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for information from one of the Executive Departments must, under the rules, objection being made, lie over one day.

FRAUDS UPON THE TREASURY.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas accusations seriously affecting the official integrity of Major General Benjamin F. Butler in the discharge of his duties while in command of New Orleans have been publicly made; and whereas other military officers have been charged with delinquencies, oppressive conduct, and connivance at fraud; and whereas it is stated that inefficiency, collusion in procuring supplies, and malversations exist in the Navy Department; and whereas recent disclosures show that in the custom-house at New York, and in other branches of the Treasury Department, the revenue has been defrauded and treasonable aid given to the insurrectionists; and whereas it is apparent that general demoralization and incapacity pervade the executive branch of the Government to an extent which calls for the interposition and preventive legislation of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed to investigate into and to ascertain the foundation for these accusations, with power to send for persons and papers, to take testimony under oath, to make recommendations for the necessary reforms, and to report at any time.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question in order that I may make an inquiry. I will renew it. Mr. COX. I object to debate.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Scheuck, Scofield, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—77.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Craven, Daves, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Fenton, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Herrick, Hohman, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKimney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Smith, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stronge, Stuart, Sweet, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—63.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. KELLEY, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, objected.

Mr. KELLEY stated that he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. DEMING also asked leave to vote.

Objection was made.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will not object if it be the understanding that opportunity, if necessary, shall be afforded for reply. There was no objection.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, at the last meeting of the House, on Thursday, my vote was given against laying the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Rogers] upon the table. That vote was given inadvertently, or, at all events, without a full appreciation of the sentiments which the resolutions contained. While I approve of much that is embodied in them, I entirely disapprove of that portion which recommends the appointment of commissioners on the part of the Federal Government to meet commissioners similarly appointed by the insurgent States. Surely this is no time for such a step. Has the gentleman any reason to suppose that an act of magnanimity like this would be rightly interpreted, or even entertained, by the government of the rebel States? So far as any public expression from that quarter has come under my observation, there is no ground for any such belief.

The resolutions provide for the appointment of commissioners on the part of the Federal Government to treat with commissioners that may, or may not, be similarly appointed by the governments of the States in rebellion. In my judgment any offer at the present time on the part of the Federal Government to negotiate or compromise with rebels defiantly in arms against that Government would be unpatriotic, unwise, and only pernicious in its tendency. Upon this point I do not feel willing to have my sentiments misunderstood.

I should be willing to go with the honorable gentleman from New Jersey to almost any extent for the purpose of bringing this unhappy war to a close, and securing an honorable peace. I would accompany him to the very verge of our constitutional powers to accomplish this, but I would not step beyond and attempt to thrust upon rebels in arms against their Government overtures of peace or compromise until we can have some evidence that such overtures would be received by them otherwise than with scoffs and repudiation.

It was for the purpose of making this explanation that I presumed to ask the indulgence of the House.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to withdraw the objection which I inadvertently made to the resolution offered a short time since by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Rice.]

The resolution was then again reported, and no further objection being made, it was passed.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. FENTON offered the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the charges recently made of official misconduct in the New York custom-house in regard to alleged shipment of contraband goods and supplies, and of misconduct in the management of the officers of the custom-house at New York, be referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON moved to reconsider the vote last taken, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, which latter motion was agreed to.

EXEMPTION FROM DRAFT.

Mr. HERRICK introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, as to exempt from any draft or conscription under the provisions of that act all such enrolled citizens now liable to draft as may by their personal efforts previous to the day assigned for any such draft procure and cause to be mustered into the military service of the United States an acceptable recruit to serve for three years or during the war, thus creating a powerful motive, and offering an additional inducement for every citizen who desires to escape the draft to personally engage in the patriotic duty of enlisting recruits for our depleted armies.

ENLISTMENT OF SLAVES IN REBEL TERRITORY.

Mr. BROOMALL introduced the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the burdens of the Government should be made to fall as nearly equally as possible upon all parts of the country; and whereas the southern portion of the country has for several years contributed little either in men or money toward the support of the Government; and whereas almost the only way to get men from that portion is to take black men; and whereas for every black man enlisted in the South some man in the overburdened North may be exempted from the draft—

It is therefore hereby declared to be the sense of this House that the Government should use its most strenuous efforts to procure the voluntary enlistment of persons claimed as slaves in the rebel territory by giving them the full bounty and pay of other soldiers, and by guaranteeing their freedom at once upon enlistment.

Mr. COX. I move to lay that resolution on the table, unless the gentleman will allow me to move to amend by providing for the conscription of all black men everywhere.

The yeas and nays being called for, they were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Fluck, Gannon, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Kaulbach, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKimney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Smith, John B. Steele, Strouse, Swat, Tracy, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Branderage, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Higby, Kasson, W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Loughead, Lovjoy, Marvin, McBride, McClung, Moohhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perlman, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question recurring on the demand for the previous question,

Mr. STEVENS said: I suggest to the gentleman that he allow this resolution to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, where there are already two or three resolutions upon the same subject. It may be thought necessary to make some modification of the resolution, so as to distinguish between freemen and freedmen.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have no objection to its being so referred.

The resolution was thereupon referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAYMENT TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. ANCONA submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the payment and refunding to soldiers of all sums withheld and deducted from their pay for clothing charged to them, lost, or thrown away through the exigencies of the service, while on the march, or in battle, by command of their officers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

The message also communicated to the House resolutions announcing the death of Hon. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Virginia.

MILITIA EXPENSES OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and made the special order for to-morrow at two o'clock.

THE REBEL STATES.

Mr. STEVENS, on leave, introduced a bill to abolish certain laws in the conquered territories of the confederate States, and to prescribe the terms of their admission into the Union; which was read a first and second time by its title, and postponed until the second Tuesday in February.

DEATH OF SENATOR BOWDEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the Senate communicating the proceedings of that body in relation to the death of Hon. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, late a Senator from the State of Virginia.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in formally announcing to you, and through you to the House and country, the death of Senator BOWDEN, of Virginia, I wish I knew more of his private history and public life; and but for the fact that his own State has no representation on this floor, I would not have consented to make the announcement. In relation to his early history, I believe he was a descendant of one of the ancient families inhabiting that once beautiful portion of Virginia known as the Northern Neck. He was a graduate of the college of William and Mary, and while yet a young man he acquired the reputation of a reliable and profound lawyer. I first met with Mr. BOWDEN in the Legislature of Virginia in 1841. He was then known as a States rights Whig. He was very courteous, polite, and easy in his manners, possessing in an eminent degree all the social qualities that made him a safe friend and an agreeable companion.

Mr. BOWDEN was a member of the convention that assembled at Richmond in 1849 to amend the constitution of the State. In a long and animated struggle between the friends of the mixed and white basis of representation, Senator BOWDEN, although coming from a large slaveholding part of the State, ably and boldly advocated the cause of free and universal suffrage and equal representation. In this he won for himself a most enviable reputation throughout the western portion of the State.

At the breaking out of the present rebellion he resided near Williamsburg, and was possessed of a comfortable estate, which, if not destroyed in the progress of the war, will leave his family in comfortable circumstances. But by far the richest inheritance left to his children is to be found in his unconquerable love and devotion to his country and the Government to which he owed his rightful allegiance. In the spring of 1861, when treason and the reign of terror were inaugurated in the Old Dominion, he took his stand, and while all things around him were bending to the storm, he had the courage to denounce the treason and the traitors, and bid defiance to their threats of personal violence. Although surrounded with traitors and imprisoned within the lines of the enemy, he firmly maintained his ground, and defended his home until the army of the Potomac set him free. He hailed the brave men that took Yorktown and Williamsburg as his friends and deliverers, and generously divided with them his substance.

About the time our army returned from the Peninsula, Mr. BOWDEN came to Washington, and was soon after elected to the Senate by the loyal Legislature then in session at the city of Wheeling. He took his seat in the Senate on the 4th of March, 1863, and continued a member of that body until the time of his death, which took place in this city on the 2d day of the present month, after a very brief illness. The friends of Mr. BOWDEN—those who knew his capacity and habits of industry best—had promised to him a long life and a bright future. They confidently hoped to see him become a useful and distinguished member of the Senate, and reflect honor upon his native State. But all their fond hopes have been brought to a close by death, the fell destroyer of our race. The earthly career of Mr. BOWDEN has closed, and he is gone to that invisible world to which we are all hastening, and from which no traveler returns.

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That in order to testify their respect for the memory of the late Hon. LEMUEL J. BOWDEN, this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes past two o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the appropriations applicable to the service of the War Department for the fiscal year 1862-63, and the amounts drawn from the Treasury during that year; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of January 5, 1864, a report of Brigadier General Totten, Chief of Engineers and Inspector of the Military Academy at West Point, giving information in relation to the cadets appointed to the Military Academy during the year 1863; which, on motion of Mr. GRIMES, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication of the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of December 23, 1863, calling for the names of major and brigadier generals who are without commands equal to a brigade; which, on motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States in answer to the resolutions of the Senate of the 16th of December, 1863, desiring information in relation to the alleged exceptional treatment of Kansas troops when captured by those in rebellion, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War, accompanied by reports from the General-in-Chief of the Army, and the Commissary General of Prisoners, relative to the subject-matter of the resolutions; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of acting assistant surgeons in the service of the United States, praying that they may be exempted from military duty as soldiers in any draft or requisition to be made; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of F. W. Lincoln, jr., mayor, and eleven hundred and eighty-one merchants and citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for a uniform ambulance system for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial from chaplains of the United States Army, praying that they may be placed, relatively, on an equal footing with other officers, when sick, wounded, or killed in the service of their country; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of soldiers who volunteered and enlisted into the service of the United States for the period of nine months, praying that they may be allowed a bounty of twenty-five dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Charles W. Denison, of Hyde Park, Massachusetts, praying to be reimbursed for expenses incurred on a mission to England; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Benjamin Dodge and others, citizens of Chelsea, Massachusetts, praying for the establishment of a uniform ambulance and hospital system for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of the "Chicago Workingmen's Association," of Chicago, Illinois, praying that the enrollment law may be so amended as to make it as little oppressive upon the people as possible; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORRILL presented a memorial of the Yearly Meeting of Friends of New England, praying for exemption from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the memorial of Francis A. Gibbons and F. X. Kelly, contractors for the erection of light-houses in the State of California and the Territory of Oregon, praying to be reimbursed for materials furnished by them; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Provincetown, Massachusetts, praying for the establishment of a uniform ambulance system for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HALE presented the memorial of Edmund Lanier, a commander in the Navy of the United States, setting forth his services and his record, complaining of the injustice which he alleges has been done him by the late advisory board, and praying for relief therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking for the construction of a military road from St. Paul, Minnesota, to the Pacific coast; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a petition of citizens of Rhode Island, praying for the immediate suspension and repeal of all duty on foreign coals for the period of one year; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of George Washington Greene, of Middletown, Rhode Island, praying that Congress will take fifteen hundred copies of the letters and dispatches of Major General Nathaniel Greene, to be published from the originals in the possession of his family, at $2 50 per volume; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of the collector and other United States officers at Portland, Maine, and also a petition of merchants of Portland, Maine, praying for an appropriation for the enlargement of the custom-house at that place; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WISCONSIN DRAFT RIOTS.

Mr. HOWE. I have a communication from the Governor of Wisconsin transmitting to me, to be laid before the Senate, a copy of petitions addressed to the Legislature of Wisconsin by Andrew M. Blair, William S. Pors, and others, asking indemnity from the Legislature for certain injuries occasioned to their persons and property by individuals combined in the county of Ozaukee to prevent the draft made under the orders of the War Department during the fall of 1862; also, transmitting copies of the testimony which accompanied these petitions; also, transmitting an act of the Legislature of that State appropriating money to compensate the petitioners, with a certificate from the treasurer of the State of the several sums appropriated and paid. All these papers I am requested by the Governor to present to the Senate, and in doing so I desire to say that my attention was called to this subject during the last session of Congress by a petition from William S. Pors, forwarded to me by the Governor of the State, in which he then claimed compensation from the Congress of the United States.

William S. Pors was the commissioner appointed by the Governor of that State to make that draft. In the progress of his labors, he was assaulted by a large combination of citizens, many of them armed. Several persons assisting him and he himself were violently assaulted; several buildings were destroyed or otherwise seriously injured; and several persons, including Mr. Pors, were driven out of the county for safety. These acts were done in open daylight, by citizens as well known as any citizens in the community; I am told, by citizens perfectly responsible in a pecuniary point of view to answer for the damages occasioned by their unlawful acts. It seemed to me at that time, and it seemed to my colleagues in the representation of that State, that it was not the proper time to make a claim on the Congress of the United States. We did think, however, and it was the unanimous opinion of the whole representation of that State, that there should be an attempt made to hold the guilty parties responsible, as far as that could be done, for the acts they had committed, and to make them responsible in damages so far as damages could be recovered from them.

With that view, the representation of our State united in a letter to the Attorney General of the United States, of which this is a copy:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 9, 1863.

SIR: We have the honor to hand you herewith an official report of William S. Pors, Esq., commissioner for Ozaukee county, in the State of Wisconsin, giving a detailed statement of the violence employed to resist the draft in that county, under the recent order of the President of the United States. We are assured by the Governor of Wisconsin that the statement is reliable.

These gentlemen, whose persons were assaulted, whose property was destroyed, and whose homes were desolated, had been guilty of no offense; they were simply endeavoring to discharge their duty to the Government under which they lived, and which promises them protection. They were faithful among the faithless. They were striving to uphold the law among the lawless. For this they were sacrificed.

We do not doubt the Government will cheerfully make compensation for the losses these gentlemen have sustained. But, we respectfully submit, the Government will not have discharged its whole duty by simply appropriating from its Treasury a sum equal to the loss sustained.

The men who have committed these outrages have incurred some responsibility, either civil or criminal, or both. Undoubtedly they are liable civilly to the amount of all damages occasioned by their misconduct. But as yet we do not learn that any prosecution has been commenced against any one of them. We are informed, although not officially, that the local authorities of the county are overborne by the number and weight of those who combined against the majesty of the law. The report of Mr. Pors states he is himself an exile from his home, and it clearly shows that he has no hope of redress except at the hand of the Government he served. It is more than two years since the Government of the United States, or its flag, furnished any protection to unoffending citizens within large portions of the State of South Carolina, and of other neighboring States. We venture to hope that such protection will not long be withheld from the loyal citizens of the county of Ozaukee, in the State of Wisconsin.

We do not think that war is necessary to vindicate the authority of the law in Ozaukee county. We believe the courts of Wisconsin are faithful and ready to do their whole duty. But these despoiled citizens need other aid than that of open courts, process, sheriffs, and possses; they need the counsel and active support of the Government. Whatever damages are recovered from the wrong-doers will diminish by just so much the compensation to be made the innocent sufferers by the Government. Besides, every dollar collected of the guilty will be an admonition and a security against a recurrence of like guilt. Whereas, if the Government makes compensation from its own Treasury, and makes no effort to punish the offenders, it will have the effect of direct encouragement to the repetition of like offenses. We therefore respectfully recommend that the Government shall employ active and faithful counsel, especially charged with the duty of seeking within the courts such redress as the laws afford for such unhappy and terrible wrongs.

J. R. DOOLITTLE,
T. O. HOWE,
J. F. POTTER,
A. S. SLOAN,
W. D. MCINDOE,

Hon. EDWARD BATES,
Attorney General of the United States.

To that letter we received from the Attorney General the following reply:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Saturday night, February 14, 1863.

SIR: To-day I had the honor to receive your letter of the 9th instant, but not the report of Mr. Pors ("giving a detailed statement of the violence employed to resist the draft") mentioned in the letter handed to me.

Very possibly the report of Mr. Pors, if I had it, might disclose facts which would change my present views of the subject, as presented by your letter. But, as the matter now stands before me, I infer that a violent riot has taken place in Wisconsin, and by certain evil-disposed persons of that State; that the object of the riot was "to resist the draft" in a particular county; and that the effect, in fact, was the maltreatment of certain individuals and the destruction of private property; and that the local authorities of the county are overborne by the rioters. Supposing all this to be so, still I do not see any field open for my official action, nor any official duty for me to perform in the premises.

The State of Wisconsin (I rejoice to know) is sound and true. It is not divided by the presence and activity of any organized party of treason and rebellion, nor even weakened by any appreciable element of seditious opposition. Surely the State of Wisconsin must have laws made for the very purpose to quell such riots and punish such offenders; and I cannot doubt that the State has tribunals and officers of its own, able and willing to enforce such good laws, by bringing the malefactors to condign punishment, notwithstanding their temporary success in a single county. That is plainly the duty of the State authorities; and I do not yet see that I have any official duty in connection with the subject.

I think, gentlemen, that I am not backward in taking all the legal responsibilities of my place, and yet I am unwilling to interfere in this local business, lest I make myself justly chargeable with officiously thrusting the hand of the General Government into the affairs of a State quite able to take care of its own interests and enforce its own laws.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDWARD BATES.
To Hon. Messrs. DOOLITTLE, HOWE, SLOAN, MCINDOE, and POTTER, Senators and Representatives of Wisconsin.

To that letter the following reply was sent, and the official statement of Mr. Pors referred to in the first letter was then forwarded to the Attorney General:

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1863.

SIR: We have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th. We regret to learn the report of Mr. Pors was not forwarded. It seems to have been mislaid, and is not now at hand.

It was however found and sent forward in the letter.

But you have very correctly anticipated its contents. And yet you will pardon us for saying you do not seem to have appreciated the true nature of our application.

Undoubtedly the State of Wisconsin is "sound and true." She is not "weakened by any appreciable element of seditious opposition" within or without her borders. She has laws for the punishment of riots and other breaches of her peace. She is quite able to enforce all "such good laws."

But we hoped the Attorney General of the United States would recognize in the conduct of these offenders something more, or at least something else, than a mere breach of the peace. We fear you do not remember who Mr. Pors was.

He does not seem to us to have been a mere citizen of Wisconsin, resting under her protection, but he was an officer under the United States, doing their work, acting under the authority of their President, and thus, we submit, entitled to their protection.

These offenders also, it should be remembered, were moved by no animosity against the State. They were citizens of the State, professedly loyal to her authority, and friends to her peace. But they said the United States were fatal to the peace of Wisconsin. They armed against the agent of the Federal authority, not against the sovereignty of the State, and they drove the United States in the person of William Pors out of Ozaukee county, as South Carolina drove you out of Charleston harbor where you were represented by the Star of the West. We respectfully submit it does not become the Government of the United States to fold their arms over this outrage upon their sovereignty while they taunt Wisconsin that her peace has been disturbed.

How far these men have made themselves liable criminally for resisting the authority of the United States, we do not pretend to advise. You will be able to determine that when you or your official aids shall have ascertained the exact facts of the case.

But we supposed there could be no doubt but they were liable civilly for all damages occasioned to those who incurred their hostility solely for being friendly to the Government. For these damages we do not doubt Congress will make compensation at some future time. So far as those damages are charged upon the guilty, the United States will stand discharged. In that point of view, it seemed to us the Government was directly interested in prosecuting the offenders rigorously and successfully.

And we do not allow ourselves to doubt that Wisconsin will acquit you of all "officious" intermeddling in her affairs when you do no more than comply with the invitation of her united delegation in Congress.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,
J. R. DOOLITTLE,
TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
JOHN F. POTTER,
A. SCOTT SLOAN,
W. D. MCINDOE.

Hon. EDWARD BATES,
Attorney General of the United States.

To this letter no reply whatever was received; but I understand that no action was taken by the Attorney General, and no professional aid was furnished to these despoiled citizens. Mr. Pors himself was driven out of the county, and could not appear in the county of which he was an inhabitant to prosecute in the courts of that county. During that session of the Legislature he united with others who were injured in an application to the Legislature, and the appropriations which are evidenced in the papers on my desk were made. The State now asks that these several papers be laid before the Senate, with the hope that Congress will reimburse the State for the amount appropriated. I ask that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred. The question of printing will go to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of B. C. Baily, praying to be reimbursed for damage sustained by the detention of the ship Argo, in 1861, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 48) for the relief of B. C. Baily. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) to continue the bounties heretofore paid, reported it back with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 9) to extend the time for paying bounties to veteran and other volunteers, have instructed me to report it back with no specific recommendation, as the other joint resolution embraces the whole subject-matter.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 35) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, have instructed me to report it back without amendment. I ask that it may be taken up and acted on now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That had better be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, it must go over under the rule.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 1) allowing the use of the Congressional Library to the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry P. Blanchard praying compensation for services performed as marshal for the consular court at Canton, China, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 47) for the relief of Henry P. Blanchard. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 12) extending the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grant of lands made by the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, reported it without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt, reported it without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass.

PRINTING OF TAX REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) to provide for printing annually the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. It is desirable that it should be passed now, as the type is standing; and I therefore ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to make it the duty of the Superintendent of Public Printing annually to print, for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, one thousand copies of his report to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a second Assistant Secretary of War; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 51) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 52) to provide for the summary trial of minor offenses against the laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILKINSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 17) relative to a certain grant of lands for railroad purposes, made to the Territory of Minnesota in the year 1857; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the vacancy on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, occasioned by the death of Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden, be filled by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. POMEROY to fill the vacancy.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS REPORT.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds be printed for the use of the Commissioner's office.

DIPLOMATIC SALARIES.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the United States minister to Spain and the United States consul at Macao, China.

MESSENGERS, PAGES, AND LABORERS.

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be authorized to employ in the service of the Senate, during the present session, such extra messengers, pages, and laborers as the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses may direct.

POST ROAD IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CARLILE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail or post route from Lost Creek post office in Harrison county, West Virginia, via Rockford and Johnstown, to Peel Tree post office in Barbour county.

BOUNTIES TO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up for consideration at this time the joint resolution reported back this morning by the Committee on Finance to continue the bounties to volunteers.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) to continue the bounties heretofore paid was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance on my motion with a view to inquire what effect its passage would probably have upon the Treasury, and how far we were able to meet it. In order to obtain the information that I desired on the subject, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, to which he has made a reply, which reply I send to the Chair to be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 11, 1864.

SIR: On receiving from you copies of Senate joint resolution No. 9 and House joint resolution No. 16, relating to bounties, with your letter inquiring "whether there are any considerations arising from the condition of the Treasury which will make the passage of either resolution dangerous or particularly inexpedient at the present time, and also requesting such suggestions with regard to any modification of either resolution or to the whole subject matter as may occur to me," I addressed a note to the Secretary of War, asking for such information as to the amount of War bounty to be required for the payment of the bounties proposed, the periods at which the money will be wanted, and the proportion of the whole amount likely to be derived from commutation for drafted men, as would enable me to make a proper reply to your letter.

The Secretary of War in answer to my note says:

"It is understood that fifty thousand veteran volunteers have been or may be enlisted from the armies in the field. Twenty-one million dollars would be required for the whole bounty to that number; $10,500,000 would be required for the installments falling due the first year.

"There are two other classes of volunteers besides what are called veterans:

"1. Those who volunteer to fill up old regiments.

"2. Recruits for new organizations.

"To those who go into old regiments $300 bounty is allowed by general circular No. 95; but to new recruits only the sum of $100, payable under the act of July, 1861.

"The Department has labored to confine the volunteer to veterans and to filling up the old regiments. A few new organizations were authorized before the present system was adopted.

"The number that will volunteer for old regiments or new organizations cannot at present, with any certainty, be estimated. But, in most of the States, vigorous efforts are being made by executive and municipal authorities to fill up the whole quota."

From this statement it appears that $21,000,000 will probably be wanted for bounties to veterans. The sum likely to be required for recruits to fill up old regiments is not stated; but if the number be assumed as equal to the number of veterans expected to reenlist, the amount required for their bounties will be $15,750,000. If one hundred thousand men are thus obtained, and the remainder of the three hundred thousand men called for be filled up by volunteers for new organizations, the further sum of $20,000,000 will be needed.

The addition, therefore, of three hundred thousand volunteers to the Army as veterans, recruits for old regiments, and recruits for new organizations, will require appropriations for bounties to the amount of $56,750,000.

But, if I understand the Secretary of War correctly, the sum of $21,000,000 includes $5,000,000 for the bounty of $100 to each man, allowed by law to all recruits, excepting colored, alike, whether volunteers or drafted men. So, too, the estimate of $15,750,000 for recruits to old regiments includes $5,000,000 of usual bounties; while the sum of $20,000,000 for two hundred thousand recruits for new organizations is wholly made up of like bounties.

If, therefore, the estimate of fifty thousand veteran recruits and fifty thousand recruits for old regiments be correct, the whole amount required under existing laws in order to the raising of the same number of men, is $20,750,000, of which sum about $15,000,000 will be required during the present year.

Taking these figures to be correct, I reply to your inquiries that I do not think that there are any considerations arising from the condition of the Treasury which will make the passage of either resolution dangerous or particularly inexpedient.

I must not omit, however, to observe that any additions to the appropriations demanded by existing estimates enhance the difficulty of obtaining the vast sums required to satisfy them.

The first duty of the Republic to its soldiers and sailors is prompt payments and sure supplies. Payments cannot be prompt nor supplies sure if appropriations exceed the probability of certain provision.

The estimates heretofore submitted require from loans for the last seven months of the fiscal year 1864, $352,226,539, or $50,318,079 a month. If vigor and decision and earnestness in the work of suppressing the rebellion shall be attended with marked progress toward its consummation, these large sums, and the additional sums required for bounties, can probably be obtained at reasonable rates.

But the whole of these additional sums, as well as every other amount added to expenditure beyond estimates, should be raised by taxation. No uncertainty can be safely allowed to attend the question of prompt payment. Delay of payment, and doubts as to its certainty, chill the ardor of the best soldiers, create dissatisfaction in the minds of dealers with the Government, enhance prices of supplies, and invite deterioration of their quality.

I trust, therefore, that the Committee on Finance will accompany any report that may be made of the resolutions referred to it with some resolutions pledging the faith of Congress to raise by taxation, beyond the $161,568,500 35, heretofore estimated as the proportion of this year's disbursements to be provided in this mode, every dollar which may be appropriated beyond the estimates submitted at the commencement of the session.

All considerations of prudence and economy require this legislation. It will be impossible to raise large sums by loans much longer unless large sums are also raised by taxation. In the report submitted to Congress at the commencement of the session, I ventured to say, "It is hardly too much—perhaps hardly enough—to say that every dollar raised for extraordinary expenditures or reduction of debt is worth two in the increased value of national securities and increased facilities for the negotiation of indispensable loans." Reflection and observation since have satisfied me that under our present circumstances the remark is an understatement of the truth.

Yours, very respectfully,

S. P. CHASE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. W. P. FESSENDEN,
Chairman Committee of Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury having stated that there is nothing in the condition of the Treasury, in his judgment, to render the passage of either resolution particularly inexpedient at the present time, the committee directed me to report the House resolution. The resolution of the Senate extended the time for the payment of these bounties until the 1st of February, but it will be noticed that one half the month of January has already elapsed. It will become necessary, therefore, in order to meet the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, to extend it some further time into the month of February, and on the whole, there being but few additional days, the committee thought it better to take the House resolution as it was, extending the time, if it be extended at all, until the 1st of March.

The Secretary made another suggestion in his letter which the Senate will have noticed; and that is, that the passage of this resolution be accompanied by a resolution pledging Congress to raise additional sums by taxation. The committee were of opinion, however, with reference to that point, that, as the originating of bills for raising revenue was, by the Constitution, exclusively given to the House of Representatives, any pledge with regard to raising revenue should, from the nature of the case, also originate there, and therefore that it was inexpedient for the Senate to introduce a resolution of that description, more especially as the Committee of Ways and Means of the House have already under consideration measures for increasing the revenue by additional taxation. We therefore did not feel at liberty to accompany the resolution as reported back to the Senate with a resolution of the kind suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury. The letter explains fully the views of the Secretary, and I can add nothing to it, as the subject was referred to our committee simply to look into that particular question. Of the propriety of the whole matter, the Senate will judge.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, which was to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as authorizes the discharge of persons drafted into the service of the United States under the authority of that act upon the payment of a sum of money not exceeding $300, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That any drafted person shall be discharged from the draft on paying to such officer as the Secretary of War may authorize to receive the same, the full sum of $300: And provided further, That every such person thus discharged shall pay, in addition to the said sum of $300, a certain proportion in the nature of a title of his annual gains, profits, or income, whether derived from any kind of property, dividends, salary, or from any profession, trade, or employment whatever, according to the following rates, to wit: on all income over $600, and not over $2,000, ten per cent.; over $2,000, and not over $5,000, twenty per cent.; and on all income over $5,000, thirty per cent.; and it shall be the duty of every such person seeking to be discharged to make return, either by himself or his guardian, to the provost marshal of his district of the amount of his income, according to the requirements of the act to provide internal revenue of July 1, 1862; and so much of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, as is inconsistent with this section, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose to modify my amendment—I will send it to the Chair as I have modified it—by striking out all of the first part, down to the seventh line, and inserting these words:

That in addition to the substitute furnished by a drafted person, or where no substitute is furnished, then, in addition to the sum fixed by the Secretary of War for the procurement of a substitute, every such drafted person shall before his discharge from the draft be held to contribute—

Now I go on with the text of the original proposition—a certain proportion in the nature of a title of his annual gains, profits, or income, whether derived from any kind of property, dividends, salary, or from any profession, trade, or employment whatever, at the following rates, &c.

And then I add at the end these words:

And be it further enacted, That the contributions thus made shall be employed by the Secretary of War in his discretion to promote enlistments or for the benefit of enlisted men.

So that the single proposition on which the Senate will vote will be whether they will make the rich man who is drafted pay more than the poor man, or whether the two shall be treated on an equality.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the question was simply the proposition stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, I would have no hesitation in voting for his amendment; but it is not. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to establish a new income tax, to be imposed only upon those who are drafted. In this view of the subject, it is an unjust and unequal tax, which makes the burden of the draft more severe than before. If the Senator desires to impose an income tax for the purpose of raising a special fund to hire substitutes, that tax ought to be imposed not only upon the man who is drafted, but upon all wealthy citizens.

There is still another objection. This income tax can only operate upon the young, active, healthy men who are subject to military duty. It does not operate upon the old men who are wealthy, who are free from military duty, and who ought to pay the largest tax. The most active, the most industrious, and the most valuable of our citizens who will have to perform military duty, are alone subject to this increased income tax, while the old, the wealthy, who ought to pay the largest taxes, would not be called upon to pay at all. It seems to me that a very little examination will show that this tax is unequal and oppressive, does not operate as an income tax equally, and I think will prevent the due execution of this law. It will raise the price of substitutes very much, and that is another argument against it. To prevent that was one of the very purposes for which the $300 commutation clause was put in the law.

If this clause be added now, what will be the effect? If the rich man is drafted, he will not pay this additional commutation money, but he will go into the market and hire a substitute.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will excuse me. I have provided for that precise case. The rich man is to supply his substitute and also a ratable contribution of his income.

Mr. SHERMAN. That makes it still worse. A man who has arrived at the age of fifty years, who has accumulated a large fortune, who is able to pay an income tax, and who would do it cheerfully, is exempt by the operation of this amendment from all burden, not only of physical service, but of an income tax; while the young, active, adventurous man, who has arrived at the age of thirty-five, who may by his industry have accumulated a sufficient sum to realize an income of over six hundred dollars, would be subject not only to be called upon to render physical service, but to pay in addition a large income tax—an income tax such as was never enforced in the history of this world. I believe in some cases, if I remember the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, it is as high as thirty per cent. I would ask the Senator if in all his reading—and we all know that he is a gentleman of great acquisitions—he ever read of an income tax of thirty per cent. I think there is no case of it in history. A title is considered a very large income tax.

It is, Mr. President, impossible to mingle these two systems. Every man holds his property subject to the right of Congress to levy taxes; and the power of Congress extends to seizing the whole of all the property of all the citizens. There is no doubt about that. Every man also who is able to render physical service is bound to render that service whenever called upon by Congress. Congress has the unlimited power to raise armies, and Congress may by law prescribe that every man able to render service shall enter the Army of the United States. These are two distinct duties, one to render physical service and the other to pay taxes. You cannot blend these two together. They operate upon different classes of individuals. Physical duty can only be rendered by those who are able to perform it, namely, the young men between twenty and forty-five. The duty of paying taxes, and the power to levy taxes, extend to all citizens who own property and who are able to pay taxes. You cannot blend these two duties together. I submit these observations now to show that the taxation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will operate unequally. It will only operate upon those who are least able to pay, the active and energetic who are already bound to render military service when called upon by Congress.

Mr. President, I do not wish unnecessarily to take up the time of the Senate in the discussion of this amendment, because I see the necessity of passing this bill as soon as possible. I have given this subject the most anxious attention. There is no subject that ought to be more carefully considered by Congress before it is finally acted upon than the amendment of the enrollment act. There are difficulties in the way. If you retain the commutation clause, you meet the objection made so ably by the Senator from Indiana. If you allow a man on paying $300 to relieve himself for three years from the operation of the draft, you may leave yourself without the basis of future drafts. You may by enforcing the conscription law be able to raise one army of three hundred thousand men; but in doing so you exhaust the basis of all future drafts and all future reinforcements. We dare not do that, we must not do it, because we do not know what the exigencies of the country may demand of us. It may be necessary for us to have a broader and more general levy. The argument of the Senator from Indiana satisfies me that the present commutation clause ought to be modified to some extent.

But, on the other hand, if you make your draft arbitrary, and allow no man to be exempted, and require every one to render military service, you will incite resistance to the draft. You will not justify it, because nothing will justify resistance; but you may excite it. If you make your draft arbitrary, so that the citizen must in all cases be seized and forced into your ranks, compelled to hire substitutes or to render military service, you make the difficulties in the way of enforcing the draft very great. It is necessary, in my judgment, to steer clear of these difficulties; and for the purpose of doing it, I have carefully framed two amendments which may be put together into one. These, I think, will answer the purpose. They have been printed and laid on the tables of Senators. I ask the Secretary to read them, so as to call the attention of the Senate to them, and then I shall submit some observations upon them.

The Secretary read, as follows:

That any person enrolled and drafted into the military service of the United States may furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. That if such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall again be placed on the roll, and shall be liable to further draft. And any person now in the military or naval service of the United States, not physically disqualified, who has served more than one year, and whose term of unexpired service shall not at the time of substitution exceed six months, may be employed as a substitute. And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from that draft, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to future draft.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be perceived that this amendment would be more proper as an amendment to section four of the bill, which provides for the substitution. It ought to be in lieu of section four, and also in lieu of section twenty. The effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be that every person drafted would have the right to hire a substitute. If he hired a substitute from among those not subject to draft, as unnaturalized foreigners, persons under twenty years of age, or men who by having already served are exempt from the draft, in such case the substitute operates to exempt the drafted person from the entire draft for three years; but if the drafted person hires a man who is himself subject to draft, they then just change places, the drafted man again takes his place on the roll where his substitute stands, and the substitute renders military service to the Government. In this way the Government loses nothing. The number of persons enrolled and subject to military duty continues the same. There can be no exhausting the roll until every man has rendered military service. The person who has employed a substitute who is himself subject to draft would be liable to be called upon at the next draft. He would take his chance precisely as his substitute would have done, and that is the way it should be. On the other hand, the $300 commutation clause is retained, so that a man whose business will not allow him to go, or who, for any reason, cannot go, may pay the $300; but he is again to take his place on the roll, and be subject to future draft. With that $300 a substitute may possibly be employed by the War Department; but if not, the War Department may go on and make another call, and the person should again be subject to military duty.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this would avoid all the difficulties in the way of enforcing the draft. I submit it now, and shall offer it at the proper time for the consideration of the Senate. In the mean time, it seems to me that we should vote down the proposition made by the Military Committee. If my proposition should be satisfactory to the Senate, as I believe it is to most of the members of the Military Committee, it will avoid the main difficulties that have been made in the enforcement of the draft.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, if it be practicable, it is desirable to avoid the raising of the prices of substitutes and the employment of brokers in that business. That has been the policy at which we have aimed, whether we have effected it or not. It seems to me that furnishing a substitute or paying the money to procure a substitute should place the man on the same footing. If not, then the man, instead of furnishing money, will go into the market and employ brokers, and the result will be to raise the price of substitutes so that the Government cannot get men. That is the necessary effect of such a course, and it will defeat the great purpose for which the commutation clause was inserted in the law. The Senator from Ohio in his amendment makes a distinction between the man who furnishes a substitute and the man who pays commutation money.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken in one respect. I make two classes of substitutes. If the substitute is himself liable to draft, I then put the man furnishing him upon the same footing as the man who pays the money; but if the substitute is not liable to draft, as if he is an unnaturalized foreigner, or under the age of twenty, or a veteran soldier who has performed his share of military duty, in that case he is a full substitute, and relieves the drafted man from the whole draft for three years. If the substitute is himself liable to military duty, I simply provide that they change places; the drafted man's name goes back on the enrollment list, and the substitute takes his place in the ranks.

Mr. COLLAMER. That does not avoid the difficulty. It still leaves a difference between a man who pays the money and a man who furnishes a substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN. In one class.

Mr. COLLAMER. It still keeps up that distinction and still makes the very difficulty; still runs us against the very trouble which we are desirous to avoid. I know that for a while it was said, in consequence of a certain expression of the old law declaring that the payment of money should clear a man from "that draft," that there was a difference between paying the money and furnishing a substitute. That, however, was afterward overruled, and for this obvious reason: "that draft" was understood to be a draft for three years, and therefore when the law said that the payment of the money should clear a man from "that draft," it must be understood to be the same thing as clearing a man when he furnished a substitute for three years. All meant the same thing, were understood in the same way. The great purpose for which that feature of the law was inserted would be utterly defeated if it were not so. The law provided that a man paying the money should be cleared from that draft. The President may order a draft at any time. I do not know what that word means unless it means a draft for three years. If it means that, then when a man pays the money or hires a substitute he is clear for three years. We are required, in order to understand what we are about, to know ourselves, and know what we mean by the words "that draft." If it is a three years' draft, as I understand, then a man is clear for three years if he pays the money. If not, what is the result? A man's name is put in and he is drafted. He is told that paying his money will not have the same effect as furnishing a substitute. So he goes into the market; he goes to a broker; the broker has runners out, and the effect is to run up the price of substitutes in the market so that the Government will not get men afterward. That will not do.

You clear him from "that draft," and you mean not a draft for three years, which would clear him for three years; well, what do you mean? The President, say, has ordered a draft to-day for one hundred thousand men. The drawing takes place, and he does not get as many as he wants. Next week he orders a draft for more, and so on for more until he gets his whole hundred thousand. Do you mean that these three drawings which it took to obtain one hundred thousand men are one draft, or three drafts? If you mean that every time you go on drafting you are to draw out of the box in which the names are placed those which have not already been drafted, then it is nothing but a continuation of the former draft. If you mean that you are to put back again all that have been drawn and have not gone into the service, all who have hired substitutes that were not subject to duty, all those who have paid the money, it comes to this: to-day I am drafted; I pay my $300 for obtaining a substitute; the Government take my $300, and next week they put my name back into the box and they draw it out again! Now, does the gentleman really mean that I shall be subject to that second draft and the Government pocket my money and keep it? I think the bare statement of the case is sufficient to startle any man's sense of common justice, much less common honesty. You draft a man to-day and take his $300, and next week you draft him again and will not return him the money. Then put it the other way: suppose the Government take the money and employ a substitute with it, and then put the man back again into the box and draft him again. Will you say that that man did not furnish a substitute when he furnished you the money by which you obtained one? And yet it seems to go on that ground. I hardly think the gentleman really means that; it cannot be possible. If he does not mean it, his amendment requires very great modifications.

I suggest to the Senator from Ohio whether it would not better carry out the view which I cannot but think he entertains, to say that if a man is drafted and furnishes a substitute or pays his money, he shall not be subject to draft again until all the persons who are enrolled have been drafted. I would not take his name out. I would leave it in for the purpose of keeping up the whole number, so that the chances should be the same; but the provision I suggest is that such a man, if again drafted, shall not be subject to be called upon to perform duty under that draft until all the persons enrolled shall have been drafted. That might create something like equality and justice, and would not prevent the taking of such a man when the necessities of the country require it.
